A Studio of Her Own is a small exhibition, and its lighting is comparatively intimate by today's standards. But the work, varying infinitely in style and media, implies a plethora of women artists in nineteenth century Boston. Its timing is brilliant, as well. Many contemporary women artists are currently in Boston, or have recently put the city on their itineraries this fall, including Nan Goldin, Nancy Sperro, and Yoko Ono.

The MFA has obviously given some consideration to bridging their exhibition of nineteenth century art with the contemporary, and has still managed to keep it local by inviting the artist Nan Freeman to work in the MFA's North Gallery concurrently with the exhibition.

A Studio of Her Own: Women Artists in Boston 1870-1940 is on view at the MFA until Dec. 2. The MFA is open Monday and Tuesday from 10 a.m. to 4:45 p.m., Wednesday through Friday from 10 a.m. to 9:45p.m., and Saturday and Sunday from 10 a.m. to 5:45 p.m. The MFA is located at 465 Huntington Avenue, or at the Museum/Ruggles stop on the Green Line. MGM dominates box office with pathetic list

By Damien Belliveau
The IUPUI Sagamore (Indiana U. - Purdue U. at Indianapolis)

The summer movie season is officially winding down and studios are moving as fast as they possibly can to claim bragging rights for the highly coveted seat of who turned the biggest profit. This year Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Inc. is waving its flag of entertainment domination high - but sadly, not for the right reasons.

MGM had four films opening in the No. 1 slot at the box office, but three of the four films earning the highly coveted spot were at best embarrassing, if not complete disasters.

Hannibal, Heartbreakers and Legally Blonde all opened up in the pole position thanks to poor competition. In theaters nothing could save Hannibal's brainless direction. The false promise that there would be lots of laughs and lots of bare skin in Heartbreakers broke many viewers' hearts.

And Legally Blonde ought to be held in contempt for expecting audiences to sympathize with a dumb blonde (producer Reese Witherspoon) who decides to attend law school because she refuses to be dumped by her equally vacuous boyfriend.

President of worldwide theatrical marketing and distribution Robert Levin stated in a press release, "This success is a tribute to all the filmmakers and artists who worked together," but these three films could only be termed art the way kindergarteners are said to be exercising their artistic skills when they smear watercolors all over a slab of cardboard with their bare hands, or feet, or face.

The one film that did manage to be artful and effective was Teepers Creepers, but when a film opens against director Tim Blake Nelson's poorly promoted tragedy about racism (O) it may be time to reconsider what constitutes a success.

Where MGM has succeeded is the DVD realm. MGM has recently released three classic films by one of the few living masters of the art form, Brian De Palma.

In the order they were seen theatrically, Carrie (1976), Dressed to Kill (1980), and Blow Out (1981) are now available on DVD.

Carrie, which was previously released in a not-so-special package crammed with little more than a production booklet and subtitle options, has returned with numerous features that live up to the over-used adjective "special."

Included along with the film about an alienated teenage girl (Sissy Spacek) with telekinetic powers, are two fabulous 45-minute documentaries on directing and producing Carrie, and another from the actors' perspective.

Other good, but not great pieces are included about Stephen King's writing Carrie, and a short retrospective about trying to turn the film into a musical.

Dressed to Kill, a suspense thriller dealing with typical De Palma themes of obsession, surveillance, false identity and mutilation, is also given the star treatment.

Most importantly, the public will now be able to witness the director's cut of Kill, which goes further than the original in the bloody gore and shocking suspense areas. Also included are a documentary featuring stars Angie Dickinson and Nancy Allen, providing very insightful information regarding the working methods of one of cinema's more elusive directors.

Blow Out, a visually stunning suspense experience starring John Travolta as a soundman caught in a web of political executions and underworld back stabbing, gets the poorest treatment, with nothing more than sound and language options.

The lack of extras doesn't really matter since the film alone, which was previously available only on a reproachfully offensive video transfer, is enough to enlighten any De Palma doubters and satisfy the director's enthusiasts.

Studios tend to gauge success by the bulk of their box-office receipts, but as this situation clearly indicates, quality has little to do with ticket sales.

Summer ball = success

Trio of Wildcats vacation abroad

By Jeff Lund
Arizona Daily Wildcat (U. Arizona)

(U-WIRE) TUCSON, Ariz. - Although the men's basketball team's fall schedule does not start until November, some Arizona players haven't taken a break since their last game in Minneapolis in March.

Three juniors - guard Jason Gardner, guard/forward Ricky Anderson and forward Luke Walton participated in organized basketball during the summer.

Gardner was part of a New York City basketball team - led by St. John's head coach Mike Jarvis - that traveled to Greece for a five-game tour. Although the team finished with a 1-4 record, Gardner said the trip was worthwhile.

"Going over to Greece with a bunch of guys I didn't know and playing with some young guys is kind of like the [Arizona] team this year," Gardner said. "[It] gave me a lot of confidence."

While on tour, Gardner averaged 17.2 points per game in a three-game tournament against the national squads from Greece, Poland and Israel. He also recorded 14 steals and 12 assists over the series.

In addition, Gardner attended a Nike basketball camp in Indianapolis with Anderson and Walton.

"I think the trip to Greece was more of a reward for (Gardner's) hard work last year," UA associate head coach Jim Rosborough said. "He was invited to tour and had the chance to play in some games. The Nike camp was more structured."

Anderson said competing with top-flight players from around the country at the Nike camp has given him confidence coming into this season.

"Basketball-wise, at the Nike camp it was a great experience for me," Anderson said. "It boosted my confidence. I know I can hang with the best in the nation."

The Nike camp gave Anderson a chance to compete against some of the nations best big men. Drew Gooden and Nick Collison of Kansas and Indiana's Jared Jeffries - all of whom are taller than the 6-foot-9 Anderson - regularly matched up against the smaller UA player.

"I worked all summer with Drew Gooden and Nick Collison from Kansas," Anderson said. "I guarded them and I didn't feel any weaker."

Anderson also said the tournament gave him and his two teammates a chance to prove they could be a formidable squad this season.

"It was great not only for me," Anderson said, "But having Luke and Jason out there with me showing people that Arizona is going to be for real. Luke and I played so well together."

Anderson and Walton also played at a Michael Jordan basketball camp in Santa Barbara, Calif., last month, Rosborough said.

"Jordan was there," Rosborough said. "They saw him, but I don't know if they played with him."

Rosborough said Arizona's core of Anderson, Gardner and Walton is poised to make this season a successful one.

"With Luke and Jason and Ricky, we are very comparable to any team's top three," Rosborough said. "It's hard to say that this year will be like last year, but we are talented enough in our young kids. The future is very bright."

While there seems to be little expected of this year's Wildcats by many college basketball analysts who haven't placed Arizona among the best teams, Gardner thinks that low rankings will only raise the team's performance.

"I think [the rankings are] motivation to go out and work harder," Gardner said. "When the games start and the ball is thrown up [we need to] just go out and prove to everyone that Arizona is still in the top."

the fuel for his daily life. He was able to take his philosophies and impart them on an entire generation of Maine hockey players."

"Because of that, the Black Bears program is one of the most successful and widely respected in the nation," Kobylanski continued. "When this December comes around and I sit up in the press box at Alfond Arena, it will be awfully funny to see a Maine hockey team without its fearless leader. Shawn Walsh was a great ambassador for the game of hockey and he will be sorely missed."

Walsh, who won the Spencer Penrose Trophy as the National Coach of the Year following the 1994-95 season, graduated from Bowling Green in 1978 and moved his focus to coaching. He took the reins at Michigan State in 1979 and led the Spartans to the NCAA semifinals in 1983-84.

In 1992-93, he led the Bears to a 42-1-2 mark as they trounced the field en route to the school's first Division I national title.

A devout family man, Walsh is survived by his wife Lynne and three sons, Tyler, 10, Travis, 8 and Sean, 2.

"This is a huge loss for college hockey and a huge loss for Maine," Cahoon said.

"The Cosby Show" behind bars

By Russ Rizzo & Katie Warchut
The GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON - A District of Columbia Superior Court judge sentenced former George Washington basketball player Attila Cosby to more than two years in jail Tuesday, saying the violent nature of his crime overshadows any testimony to Cosby's good character or potential.

"The viscous, nasty, violent and really unexplained nature of the crime requires significant punishment," Kravitz said to the former 6-foot-9 transfer forward. "It is essential that the court sends a clear message that it is not acceptable to prey on the most vulnerable members of society."

Cosby was convicted in July on seven misdemeanor counts for sexually assaulting an alleged prostitute with a cocaine addiction. According to testimony, Cosby assaulted the woman with a broomstick and forced oral sex at gunpoint when he brought her to his Guthridge Hall room in May 2000.

Cosby, who was suspended from GW following his conviction, will now serve two years and four months in jail after already serving two months while he awaited sentencing.

He received the maximum 180-day sentence for five charges, including sexual abuse, attempted possession of a gun, attempted threat, assault and attempted possession of a prohibited weapon. He also received 120 days for second-degree theft and 60 days for attempted threats.

The sentence for threats with a broomstick and attempted possession of a prohibited weapon will run concurrently, meaning Cosby will serve both 180-day sentences simultaneously.

Kravitz said Cosby might have been spared a light sentence because U.S. attorneys brought seven misdemeanor charges against him to avoid a grand jury trial. A felony conviction would have carried a minimum of five years instead of the maximum three and a half he faced, the judge said.

"One-hundred and 80 days is insufficient for the sexual assault," Kravitz added, "but I am bound by that limit."

Original felony charges brought against Cosby were later dropped in July 2000 when the victim failed to show for the hearing. She testified in the second trial.

Before the sentence was announced, Cosby's lawyer Billy Martin urged the judge to save him from a fate that would ruin his life. He said he had watched Cosby "deteriorate" in jail as he awaited his sentencing and asked the judge for a "second chance at life."

An unshaven Cosby, dressed in gray slacks, a white shirt and a blue tie, used a tissue to wipe tears from his eyes during the proceedings. His girlfriend Lisa Couser sat in the audience while his godmother waited outside the courtroom with his 16-month-old son Malik.

Reminding the judge that Cosby will always be branded a sex offender and has already lost a large scholarship to play basketball at GW, Martin said, "Attila Cosby has never been incarcerated. Attila Cosby as he stands before you judge, is not somebody you should throw away."

"He's never had a chance at supervision," Martin said. "He has always been the superstar. He has never had someone to say, 'Here's what you need to do.'"

U.S. attorney Ben Friedman told the judge that the sentencing recommendation from Cosby's parole officer was biased because it relied on information from his friends and coaches with little information from the victim. Reminding the judge about conflicting testimony from Cosby and withheld facts during the trial, Friedman said the judge should not be swayed by any character testimony.

"What he does not have the right to do is take the stand and not tell the truth, and that's what happened," Friedman said, adding that Cosby had not accepted responsibility for abusing the 46-year-old crack-cocaine user.

In a last plea for a reduced sentence, a tearful Cosby looked back to the woman he was convicted of assaulting and said, "I'm sorry; I made a mistake."

When the judge asked Cosby for "insight" into how the assault happened, Cosby responded, "I was moving a little too fast, not realizing what I had to lose. I wasn't using my head."

Cosby's lawyers have 30 days to file an appeal.

Vice President for Student and Academic Support Service Robert Chernak said GW made a mistake taking a chance with Cosby. "I know that there were, often times, many assurances by (former coach Tom) Penders to (Athletic Director) Jack Kvanc that the proper research had been done, that this was a risk they could take."

"It was a mistake, in retrospect, for the coaching staff that was in place at the time to recruit him."

SUNY skies before Williams rains shutout

By Elena Panesis
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team departed Williamstown, Mass. Saturday with its glass half full after splitting two non-conference matches. The Minutemen defeated SUNY-Binghamton 4-3 and fell to Williams College 4-0.

Coach Judy Dixon considered the weekend merely a warm-up to the more vital Atlantic 10 matches during the spring season. With sophomore star Rory Theis sidelined for the fall, brand new doubles combinations and an inexperienced line-up from No. 4-6, one could say the Maroon and White fared exceptionally well in its pre-season endeavor.

"I came away feeling very positive because we're down a key player," Dixon said. "We're looking for individual effort and how we do in the fall is a warm-up for the spring when Rory comes back healthy. There are three areas I'm concerned with – physical fitness, match toughness and freshmen play."

The UMass squad excelled in Dixon's three key areas during its match against SUNY-Binghamton as both singles and doubles looked impressive. Doubles play always sets the tone of the match and the Maroon and White captured two of the three matches and thus the point. In much of its play last season, when the team succeeded in doubles, it brooded the confidence to defeat its singles opponents.

The tandem of No.1 senior Steve Prisco and freshman Scott Sans-Leeb soundly defeated the pairing of Dimitri Litvak and Brad Davidoff 8-5. Phil Rodrigues and Reid Stubbs also showed up to play as they topped Brad Sherwood and Crishnu Lalabran 9-7 in a hard-fought match.

In No.1 singles Steve Prisco breezed past Litvak 6-2, 6-2 while the two freshmen Sans-Leeb and Stubbs also made short work of their opponents securing the victory for the Minutemen.

"For the freshmen, playing in the fall really warms us up for the spring when it really matters," said Stubbs. "This weekend I played the best that I've ever played for UMass. I feel we really made progress and found out the best part of each other's games."

The defeat at the hands of Division III Williams College proved a little disappointing for the defending second place team of the Atlantic 10 conference. Yet, the squad only had a half hour in between matches to prepare for the Division III National Champions. In actuality, Dixon took away a lot of positives from the 4-0 loss.

"I saw a lot of effort and intense play in terms of fitness," said Dixon. "We did get tired in the Williams match but we had little time to get ready after the first match. Mentally we made some mistakes. We need to play more matches to prepare. The No. 1 and No. 3 doubles both played well and the No. 2 team will get better. Overall, I was very pleased with the weekend."

Though the 4-0 score indicates a shut out, the Maroon and White faired well in doubles with some fairly close scores for the three tandems. The pairing of Prisco/ Sans-Leeb just came up short to Josh Lefkowitz and Andrew Murray (8-6) and showed some promise for future play. Also, Sans-Leeb led his match 7-6 before it was called in the second set since Williams had already captured the four points to come away victorious.

In general, No.'s 1-4 showed a strong degree of mental toughness and physical fitness. Yet, both No. 5 Eric Rehlin and No.6 Rodrigues need to play more duel matches to accelerate their current level of play.

"Phil didn't play a lot last year and neither did Reblin," senior Todd Champeau said. "They just need to get some more matches in and some more practice. Right now Steve and I are the only guys with a lot of experience.

Because of that I think we're going tbe a team to be reckoned with later in the season. We have a couple things we need to get down but we'll be fine once the season gets going."

UMass splits in Philly

DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

The stingy UMass defense shipwrecked the Explorers, but the Minutewomen couldn't declaw the Owls.

By Matt Brody

With membership in the Atlantic 10, the teams of the University of Massachusetts often mark down trips to Philadelphia on their travel itineraries. That's not to say it gets any easier to play there.

The UMass volleyball team (6-3, 1-1 Atlantic 10) split its two matches in Philadelphia on the opening weekend of conference action. The Minutewomen posted an impressive .343 kill percentage in a three-game sweep of LaSalle, but sputtered offensively in falling in consecutive games to conference rival Temple.

In Saturday's match (9-2, 2-0 A-10), the Owls' multifaceted offense proved too much for the Maroon and White as the home squad sent the visitors packing 3-0 (30-25, 30-25, 30-24). Four Owls posted more than ten kills in the match and setter Solana Lee dished out 38 assists for the victors. Temple also proved strong on defense, as the team dug out 53 UMass attempts, led by Lee's 13 and Shu Liu's 11 digs in the match.

"[The Owls] were dynamic on their attack, and they played incredible defense," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We just couldn't terminate [on their offense]. They have a little bit more experience on their team."

As for the Minutewomen, only senior Lauren Vahder Veen was in double figures in the kill category as she threw down 12 winners and posted a 429 kill percentage in the three-game set. Senior co-captain Lymaric Llovet led the defense as she dug out 11 balls on the evening.

Friday brought better tidings for UMass, as it blew by the Explorers in consecutive games (30-23, 30-21, 30-25). Co-captains Llovet and Janeen DeMarte led the Maroon and White attack, as they each posted 12 kills, with DeMarte recording only one error en route to a .579 kill percentage for the match. Sophomore standout Nitia Small added ten kills of her own, while junior transfer Inka Stehnova helped out the offense by distributing 36 assists.

"Janeen and Lymaric both played very well against LaSalle," Kenny said. "It was good to start off conference play with a win on the road."

LaSalle struggled offensively, with only freshman Lindsey Viehmann notching double figures in kills (12). Senior leader Kristin Russu struggled all match, and posted a mere two kills to go along with six errors in her 18 attempts. As a team, the Explorers put up a dismal .030 kill percentage for the match.

The split weekend leaves the Maroon and White tied for third place in the early-goings of A-10 action. Xavier and Rhode Island have both posted identical 1-1 conference records, while Temple, George Washington and Dayton are tied for the conference lead with 2-0 records.

The Minutewomen are in action again tonight at 7:00 as they travel to Connecticut to take on Fairfield University for a non-conference match. The Stags have posted a 5-4 record early on this season in defense of their MAAC Championship. Their 28-7 record, which landed them in the NCAA Tournament, featured a mid-season 23 game win streak including a five-set victory over UMass at Curry Hicks Cage.

"We always have a good dogfight with them," Kenny said. "If we can contain them, we'll be all right."

The Stags are led on offense by senior co-captain Joanne Saunders and junior Sonny Paul. Saunders leads the team with 3.72 kills per game while Paul is close behind with 3.39 kills per game to go with a .302 kill percentage. Saunders also provides leadership on the defensive side of the ball, as her 2.89 digs per game is also tops on the team.

Last year's match was a dogfight between the two regional rivals, as four UMass players, including current Minutewomen Llovet and DeMarte, posted double-doubles in the five-set marathon. Saunders and Paul were outstanding for the visitors, as they were 1-2 on the team in kills with 28 and 26, respectively.

"We're just going there to win a non-conference match on the road," Kenny said. "We're just going to get down to business."

Additionally, the American Volleyball Coaches Association selected University of Massachusetts head coach Bonnie Kenny to its board of directors yesterday. She will take her position in 2002, when she replaces interim representative Jim Bertolli of Indiana State as the Division I representative on the committee. Kenny, in her ninth season at UMass and 18th season overall in Division I, has been an active member in the AVCA for several years.

In taking the position, according to Kenny, she would serve as the liaison for all Division I volleyball coaches and will serve as the "sounding block for Division I coaches." Additionally, the board is in charge of all issues that come up with rules, scoring changes, and the like. The board meets every year at the AVCA's annual convention and at the men's Final Four championship.

Kenny has served on the District I ranking committee since 1998 and on the AVCA All-American Selection Committee since 1999. This fall, she took over the role of chairman on that committee. Additionally, she is currently a voter for the USA Today/AVCA Coaches Top 25 poll.

Last season, Kenny racked up her 150th win for UMass in a 3-1 triumph over URI. Her 160-107 record with the University places her second on the all-time wins list, behind only current softball coach Elaine Sortino. In her career, Kenny has amassed a 331-217 record between her time at UMass and at South Carolina, where she served as head coach from 1984-1992.

Additionally, the AVCA appointed Macalester College's Stephanie Schleuder to the position of president, where she will take over for Denise Van De Walle of Bowling Green, who was acting as interim president after Washington State's Cindy Frederick left office. Bertolli will take on the role of head of the Legislative Board for the AVCA, where he will serve a three-year term beginning in 2002.

Maine's Walsh loses battle with cancer

Legend leaves legacy of success

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

The Hockey East Association suffered a major loss yesterday as longtime Maine head coach Shawn Walsh lost his hard-fought battle with cancer. The 46-year-old was pronounced dead at Eastern Maine Medical Center where he had checked in on Sept. 12 after contracting pneumonia.

Fifteen months ago Walsh was diagnosed with renal cell carcinoma, a rare form of cancer. Soon afterward, he had his left kidney and left lung removed, and underwent two intensive immunotherapy treatments and a stem cell transplant.

This was to be Walsh's 18th season with the Black Bears, where he won two national championships, in the 1992-93 and 1998-99 seasons, and led his team to eight appearances in the Frozen Four. His 599-214-44 record ranked him 11th among active coaches on the wins list and 19th all-time.

Shawn Walsh

"In the public's mind, no one was more closely associated with the University of Maine than Shawn," said Dr. Peter S. Hoff, Maine University president, in an interview with ESPN. "It didn't matter whether you followed college hockey or not, people knew Shawn and they knew him as an ambassador of and for UMaine."

After receiving a stem cell transplant from his brother, Kevin, Walsh suffered from several side effects. He was forced to take drugs that shut down his immune system, leaving him susceptible to infections such as pneumonia.

"He was an incredible competitor," said Massachusetts head coach Don Cahoon.

"Hockey pales in comparison to the way he battled that disease. He did a brilliant job coaching that team last year."

In 1998-99 a weekend series between UMass and Maine in Amherst the eventual National Champion Bears lost to and tied the Minutemen. After reading what was printed in the Collegian following the weekend, Walsh claimed he was misquoted and sent the newspaper a "nasty letter" said former hockey beat writer Michael Kobylanski.

"My first impression of Shawn Walsh was of a mean-spirited individual who really overreacted to a simple situation," said Kobylanski, who now serves as Assistant Athletic Director/Sports Information at Quinnipiac University. "But after getting to know him over the past few years, I realize that that same energy was

Administration heads come together to think about future

By S. J. Port
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. Aaron Lazare, Chancellor of the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester, spoke yesterday to members of the Amherst campus and community in the Student Union Ballroom concerning the findings from his study of the Amherst Campus as Chair of the Amherst Task Force.

Lazare was appointed last February by President William Bulger to chair the Amherst Task Force in an effort to "assess opposition and barriers to success and promote more efficiency" on the Amherst campus and to develop a more concise and directed plan for its future.

"Lazare has a positive, forward looking approach and a great love for this campus," University President William M. Bulger said in his introduction. "While others have come to scrutinize, he has come to listen."

"Why did I undertake this? Because the President asked me, period," said Lazare, explaining why he accepted the assignment.

Since his appointment as Chair, Lazare has met with 100 students, faculty, administrators and community members to discuss how they feel about the Amherst campus and what they would look for in a new chancellor. From these interviews Lazare, a clinical psychologist by profession specializing in social psychology, concluded that the strength of this campus lies with its faculty.

According to Lazare, those interviewed were "wanting more for themselves and for their campus," and as having, "such aspirations for campus." He reminded faculty and administrators that "as much as we have progressed, everyone else is progressing, so we have to keep working."

"Whether the budget be 25 percent less or increases by 25 percent," Lazare said, "The university has to decide what it wants to do with excellence and work on those things first."

Lazare observed the need to develop departments and programs of "national distinction" in order to bring in more national attention and recognition for the school. Lazare noted the recent establishment of the Commonwealth College as one more step in promoting the academic integrity and strength of the university, quoting reports that put the Commonwealth College programs in the top 25 percent of programs. However, attention was also drawn to the fact that while we spend more than the average spent by schools in our comparative classification (these schools include; the University of Connecticut, Rutgers University, and the University of Texas A&M) on Student Services and Financial Aid programs, we spent less on academic programs. Lazare believes this under-funding of academic programs could be hindering the University's ability to provide top notch academic programs to its students. He remarked, too, that the University spent slightly below average on their students, $19,005 per student as opposed to the average of $19,455.

The University of Connecticut, who Lazare views as UMass' largest competitor for the reputation of best public school in New England, spends an average of $25,130 to educate, house and provide for each of their students.

Alumni support, Lazare declared, is a hugely untapped resource for UMass. Only an average of 15 percent of UMass alumni donate, and only a minimal amount of these donations are liquid donations. He stressed research showing out of state views of UMass as being better than those held by state residents.

"The University is first for the students, and second for the taxpayers," Lazare said.

Drawing on his experiences with the Worcester campus, Lazare explained that it was through work with the state government and community that the Medical School had found great support both financially and within departments of the legislature. He did not see the same support for the Amherst campus from these groups and believes it is due to the reputation of the Amherst students as being "rowdy, rude, and often destructive to their environment."

SCOTT ELDRIDGE II / COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger was present on campus for a forum to discuss the new chancellor selection process

"You have no idea how much you're paying for (that perception)," Lazare said.

He went on to emphasize the importance of what other's perception of the campus was, hinting too that Amherst campus administrators had a reputation of making plans and not following through.

Lazare proposed that the direction for the next generation at UMass Amherst should develop intellectual property, dedicate itself to service to the community and other entities, have greater research productivity, and put UMass Amherst online with the other great public universities in our nation.

To begin this new generation, Lazare is assisting in the search for a new chancellor. Lazare explained what he was looking for in a new chancellor

"Academic experience, a track record of administrative success and the ability to recruit and retain outstanding people who work well together, interest in and a vision for the future of higher education," Lazare said. "Commitment to a mission that can be supported by and shared with the campus and other stakeholders, a commitment to performance based leadership, and a passion for excellence and energy to match the passion."

To entice a qualified leader and welcome them to the community Lazare proposed a fundraising drive for a recruitment package that the new chancellor could use for the "academic mission" and to send a message that UMass Amherst is dedicated to the idea of improving itself. Inviting others to take on the fundraiser Lazare promised to donate the first thousand dollars.

Lazare advocated the need for a clearly defined mission statement for and by the UMass community and administration. A statement, he believes, would lend a hand in illustrating the "depth and breadth that is available at the Amherst campus as the flagship campus for the University of Massachusetts." Lazare put emphasis on the idea of broadcasting the fact that the Amherst campus is the flagship for all UMass campuses, saying the title was both a privilege and a responsibility to lead the campuses.

"This campus in a very good campus," Lazare said. However, he went on to repeat and emphasize that it could be a better campus.

Western Mass Global Action Committee schedules trip to DC for protests and peace

By Shawn Ilnitch
Collegian Staff

Members of a Western Massachusetts Coalition will be traveling to Washington D.C. this Saturday as part of a national protest against military action to solve the world's terrorist problem, racism against Muslims and other groups, and the infringement of civil liberties.

The coalition, Students for a Peaceful Response (SPR), is made up of members from the UMass Radical Student Union, five college groups including the International Socialists Organization, the Socialist Alternative, and the Palestinian Students Coalition, as well as the Western Massachusetts Global Action Coalition (WMGAC).

According to Kevin O'Brien, a representative from the coalition, the group was started when members of the Radical Student Union met in their office the Wednesday after the attacks. They were discussing their reactions and decided that they felt a peaceful response was best. They contacted the other five college groups and decided to work together to advocate a peaceful response.

"A lot of us were feeling the same reactions as everyone when the World Trade Centers came down- pain, anger, confusion," said O'Brien. "We felt it would be a greater tragedy if more innocent people would die."

After an organizational meeting, the group agreed on five points of unity. O'Brien summed them up as: they would grieve for the lives lost in the tragedy, they would oppose any anti-Arab scapegoating, they would oppose any military action, they would defend civil liberties, and that they would not support President Bush's racist agenda.

The group held a rally last Thursday that drew approximately 60 people. Speakers included Enoch Page, an associate professor of Anthropology at UMass, Arlene Avakian, a professor in the Women Studies Department, and Jean Grossholtz from WMGAC.

While the SPR was holding its rally, over 150 schools were taking part in a national day of solidarity as part of the group called Peaceful Justice: Concerned Student for Justice Without War, which was organized at Wesleyan College in Connecticut.

Many groups who took part in the national day of solidarity are also expected to make the trip to Washington.

Currently, the WMGAC is mobilizing transportation to Washington. Once there, they are expected to join thousands of protestors from across the country.

The rally is being organized by the International Action Center (IAC), a national grass roots organization center formed out of the anti-war movement during Operation Desert Storm.

Nancy Mitchell, an organizer for the IAC, expects a large crowd. "Right now, we are expecting well into the thousands in terms of attendance. When it is all said and down we could see 10,000 or more protesters or more," she said.

The IAC had secured permits to protest at Lafayette Park across from the White House to protest the since cancelled World Bank/IMF meetings in Washington. Since the cancellation of the meetings, the IAC has focused their attention on a rally for peace and to end the racists attacks on Arab Americans that have occurred since the terrorist incidents on Sept. 11.

Mitchell expects about 350 protestors from Western Massachusetts, including those from the UMass community.

In addition of the UMass protestors, Mitchell said that the IAC expects people to come from as far away as Colorado. She also knows of five buses coming from New York.

"The support has been tremendous," said Mitchell, "all of those centers that were focusing on the World Bank have turned themselves into anti-war and anti-racism centers."

"We are expecting a peaceful demonstration," added Mitchell.

The SPR is planning a march in Northampton to coordinate with the national rally. The march will leave from the Bridge Street School at 11:30 a.m. and pass the courthouse at 11:45, meeting a weekly vigil for peace held at the courthouse. The march will invite any people at the peace vigil to join them and will then continue onto Pulaski Park. SPR hopes that the march will allow students and community members to speak out for peaceful alternatives.

Massive IMF protest cancelled; timing not right for Mobilization

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

The national group Mobilization for Global Justice (MGJ) had originally organized a massive grassroots demonstration on Sept. 30 in Washington D.C. in order to protest the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF) meetings. However the event has been cancelled due to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"We choose this course of action regardless of the plans of the World Bank and IMF, and respect other organizations that choose a different path," stated an official MGJ press release. "Our decision to postpone was made out of respect for the victims of this tragedy."

The Western Massachusetts Global Action Coalition (WMGAC), the five-college chapter of the MGJ, which includes students, workers, community organizations, and trade unionists from the surrounding area, had formerly planned on mobilizing several hundred people to attend these demonstrations.

Nonetheless the consensus among the group was that the cancellation was the best course of action considering the nation's current climate.

"We feel like the timing is not right now for people to merge on D.C.," said University of Massachusetts graduate student Tim Scott, Union Organizer for the local MGJ chapter.

Looking further into the future, the MGJ made sure to note that because the policies of the World Bank and the IMF have not changed, the organization would continue its efforts to "hold these institutions accountable for their roles in structuring an unjust and inequitable global economy."

World Bank and IMF are both international organizations heavily dealing in the financial assistance of poorer communities.

World Bank has self-described itself as the world's largest source of development assistance and an organization of five institutions that work in more than 100 developing economies and mainly focuses on aiding the poorest people in the poorest countries.

IMF accredited itself as "an international organization of 183 member countries, established to promote international monetary cooperation, exchange stability, to foster economic growth and high levels of employment, and to provide temporary financial assistance to countries to help ease balance of payments adjustment."

Currently the MGJ has issued four demands on the World Bank and IMF: namely to have their meetings open to the media and the public, to cancel all impoverished countries' debts to the companies, to end policies such as "structural adjustment," which conditions limit peoples' access to clean water, health care, education, and the right to organize, and to end their oil, gas, and mining activities and their support of building dams that would force people to relocate.

Before Sept. 11, MGJ had scheduled the Peoples' Summit, an educational forum and teach-in, to correspond with the World Bank and IMG annual meetings.

Again, because of the terrorist attacks, the Peoples' Summit was postponed out of respect and is now being held from Sept. 26-28 in Washington D.C. MGJ plans on bringing forth many of the issues that have been raised since the attacks into its dialogue during its meetings.

While individual members of the Amherst/Northampton community may attend the Peoples' Summit, WMGAC will not be in formal attendance.

Scott explained that the group feels the nation's climate is still not right for such an event, but said the local MGJ chapter would be strategizing its game plan for the upcoming weeks.

Nomination papers for Area elections available

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

With Senate elections completed, the Student Government Association's Executive Cabinet is looking towards yet more on-campus elections, this time for Area Governments.

Nomination papers were released today for students interested in running for an Area Government position, as well as for residential House Councils. Dates for these elections have yet to be announced.

Area Governments are made up of students from the six on-campus residences: Southwest North and Southwest South, Orchard Hill, Sylvan, Central and Northeast. They are responsible for running activities within their own living areas, and are assigned a budget with which to do so.

Area Governments work with the SGA in a variety of ways. One important function is to nominate one person from each area to serve as an elections commissioner for the SGA Elections Council.

This has proven to be an issue in the past, specifically with the Senatorial, Presidential and Trustee elections. This year, for instance, only two of the required five commissioners were hired.

Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Tom Fleenor, however, expressed that he expects to see changes in the future.

"I've had people come up to me while I was posting fliers who wanted to be involved and they just didn't know how," Fleenor said. "We're going to be having two information sessions on October 11, one in Mary Lyon (a Northeast dormitory) at 8 p.m. and the other at 9:15 in Van Meter (a Central dormitory)."

The information sessions will be held in an effort to make students aware of Area Government and to find out how to be involved, explained Fleenor. He continued by expressing that, due to student's lack of information in previous years, Area Governments have suffered.

"I'm confident that when it comes to getting students to vote and be involved we'll get the five percent needed," Fleenor said. "We're going to do more than just flyers this year. We want to get out and talk to people and get the information out."

Aside from the opening of the Area Government and House Council elections race, members of the SGA will also be tying up lose ends this evening. The last meeting of the SGA Coordinating Council at 7 p.m. will take place in hopes of ratifying last Friday's Senate Elections.

The elections, which received the needed five percent student vote, have proved to be successful despite pre-election fears.

"I haven't heard any complaints and I made it clear prior that if any one has an issue with the elections to bring it forward prior to the Coordinating Council meeting," Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders said.

"We've done a 180 degree turn since where we were this time last year and were just getting started."

CORRECTION

In yesterday's SGA article, it was incorrectly stated that the Senate elections needed to be ratified within 48 hours. The Coordination Council has 30 days to ratify the elections. The Collegian regrets the error.

Let's not panic
Gas masks unecessary

Fear.

It is perhaps the single most decisive motivator of all time. The fear for loved ones that may be in danger and the fear for our own safety causes many Americans to react irrationally. Gas masks, homemade fallout shelters and backyard bunkers; although it may sound like the United States during the second World War it is becoming a reality for some Americans, who insist upon protecting themselves from a potential resurgence of terrorist attacks. Paranoia surrounding the attacks has reached an all-time high in the United States as military supply stores across the country have found their shelves barren of gas masks. The alien green facial devices have been sold at alarming numbers providing security to buyers and giving them the false sense that they will be safe against terrorist attacks.

Since the September 11 attacks, retailers have found that their requests for gas masks have more than tripled and now mirror the widespread panic for supplies that ensued right before the Y2K New Year.

People have gone so far as to call suppliers lobbying for the creation of pet sized masks in order for all of their loved ones to feel safe from future attacks. Do the masks really protect against biological warfare? Well, yes and no. First if you are really serious about buying a gas mask then be ready to shave off all of your facial hair because in order for it to work properly it needs to be close to the face. This doesn't really bode well for the pets whose furry faces could need at least a day of shaving before they were safe from biological weapons. Second, if the mask is not fitted to the individual faces of each buyer then it leaves air gaps, rendering it ineffective.

Why the terror and the willingness to spend over $300 on a mask that will likely be rendered ineffective? Possibly people are just looking for a sense of safety, a life preserver of sorts in a sea of chaos and confusion. Throwing common sense to the wind they run to stores to buy rations of food, build bunkers in their homes and stock up on gas masks.

By running out and buying war gear Americans are just giving in to the panic and pandemonium that is at the heart of terrorism itself. The reason why attacks are successful is because they instill an unquenchable and even irrational fear in those who were harmed either physically or emotionally during the assaults. The attacks prevent people from going on with their normal lives, send them running out to the stores in search of protection against biological weapons, keep them from drinking city water and send them to their back yards to build bomb shelters. Gas masks cannot help prevent all kinds of attacks, although we wish that they could be a solution to all of our problems, gas masks and precautionary measures can not bring back Americans that were lost and they cannot keep us safe from all harm either.

There is nothing wrong with preparation and protection but living your life in a state of constant anticipation for the next calamity prevents you from living a normal life. Protection against harm is a reasonable idea but there is such a thing as overprotection.

Go ahead and join the socialists
Here are some reasons why

SAM WILKINSON

I can walk up and down the hallways in the Campus Center and never pay any heed to what fliers are on the wall beside me. Despite their big bold letters and bright colors, I have basically had no problem walking by every single flyer I see. That's a bad thing, I'm sure, but I don't have enough time to check out most events on campus.

That was the old me. A few weeks ago, I saw a flyer that changed my life. It changed my existence. It changed me. It asked why I should join the Campus Socialists.

Again, whenever I'm walking by these flyers, I just keep going. I don't have any interest in the Science Fiction club (only three months 'til Lord of the Rings!) or the MASSPirg ("We want to save the trees so we'll have enough paper for our fliers!") or whatever other club is announcing events. But the Campus Socialists, whew. It was all I could do to keep from joining right then.

I hadn't really thought about it before, why haven't I joined the socialists? Why have I steadfastly remained rooted in traditional politics? I don't have an answer. And after almost 15 minutes of pure, deep, amazing thought, I came up with a set of reasons for joining the Campus Socialists.

So why am I joining?

-Because when I get eyeglasses at Lenscrafters, I ask for, nay, demand!, thin, black-rimmed intellectual glasses.

-Because when I sit at Rao's talking about the world's injustices, I can't help but love being surrounded by people who are so "totally, like, fed up with the Man!"

-Because the money I earn is oppressing somebody else and that's no fair.

"That was the old me. A few weeks ago, I saw a flyer that changed my life. It changed my existence. It changed me. It asked why I should join the Campus Socialists."

-Because I honestly believe that I am smarter than the rest of world. When people disdain the socialists, I like to mutter under my breath "if you only knew, you'd be a socialist too."

-Because I'm a graduate student.

-Because I really believe Palestinians are totally innocent and Israeli-Jews are totally guilty. I lack what you might call a subtlety when it comes to looking at political situations, so I just pick whichever side appears to be more oppressed.

-Because my total conception of social protest involves drinking a latte just before I hurl a brick through a Starbucks window while screaming "down with corporations!"

-Because Phish hasn't been on tour for more than a year and I'm looking for something to do with my time.

-Because being a member of the Campus Socialists means I am one short step from joining the Radical Student Union and any group that calls itself "radical" probably thinks of itself as being totally "cowabunga" too.

-Because I blindly believe that all corporations are evil; well, except for the one that made my laptop and the Sport Utility Vehicle that my father bought me.

-Because Mumia is innocent. He won't say that of course, but I just have a feeling he is.

-Because, damn it, socialism has worked so well everywhere in the world. Well, maybe not Cuba, but definitely everywhere else. Ok, the USSR didn't exactly work out either, but after those two it has defi...huh? Ok, yes, China hasn't been a striking success, and Poland didn't really prosper but otherwise, it's been perfect.

-Because I'm a communications major and everything Sut Jhally says is correct. He changed my life. Pepsi really does want to kill my children.

-Because du-nuh-du-du-nuh-du-du-nuh! Rage Against the Machine rules! Awowwow-winka-winka-wowwow!

-Because I don't think it's fair that the United States would want to get revenge on those guilty in the World Trade Center attacks. Instead, I believe only that the United States was at fault and we would be better off to let terrorists kill innocent people as long as they do it because they hate America because, hey, I hate America too.

Because violence is bad, regardless. Oh, unless it involves revolutionaries rising up against capitalism. If that's the situation, let the killing commence.

-Because it's easier for me to give up the wealth that I have because I know I can always go back to it if this whole "socialism" thing doesn't work out.

Because I want to be friends with the long-white-haired, old man with the beard that is on campus every single day!

-Because I have a conception of how the world works and it doesn't involve the inherent evil of people, especially their propensity for taking advantage of a situation like socialism.

Let's be honest. Those are 19 overwhelming reasons for me to join up. I could come up with plenty more – because my beard is more than evidence of the fact that I don't have any razors – but what would it be worth it? If all of those reasons aren't enough, then nothing's going to be!

Now, will somebody tell me where I can sign up?

U.S. vs. the Middle East
We must reach compromise not war

BILL LARKIN

In the seconds, minutes and hours following the airline crashes in New York and Washington, the mainstream television media broadcast images of surprise and words of anger from Americans to the public.

Reporters from ABC, FOX, CNN and other news agencies held interviews with bloddied secretaries and hobbled executives vowing "vengeance" against those behind the "unwarranted" attacks. Soon, federal investigation began to implicate the renowned "terrorist," Osama Bin Laden, as the mastermind behind the deaths of over 5,000 people.

Bolstered by the near-unilateral support of an indecisive Congress and a frantic public, President George W. Bush declared a "war on terrorism" in an address to the nation. Although the imminent war will target Afghanistan's Taliban regime, which Bush claims "is threatening people everywhere by sponsoring and sheltering and supplying terrorists," it will involve over 60 countries. The president said "any nation that continues to harbor or support terrorism will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime." Drawing battle lines, Bush told Eastern nations "either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists."

"Do not let the events of Sept. 11 fuel further oppression and violence; give the crash victims' deaths meaning by demanding the proliferation of civility, both at home and abroad."

According to Bush's definition, America has declared war not only on Islamic countries such as Afghanistan, Libya, and Iraq, but also on itself. Since World War II, the United States has supported the rise of pro-Western governments in Middle Eastern nations rich in natural resources and political geography. These right-wing governments strengthen the United States' leadership atop the global economy by facilitating trade, protecting the operations of American corporations, and implementing labor laws that suppress unionization efforts and ignore human rights violations.

When Washington authorizes military and economic support to countries warring with Muslim nations (e.g. Israel), they instill helplessness in the minds and hearts of Arabs worldwide. As the puppet regimes insult Islamic moral traditions by quieting practices that scare Western interests, the "terrorism" waged by the United States rapes Arabian cultures. When nations such as Iraq and Libya refuse to accept American influence, the United States punishes them with embargoes that starve millions of children. Blocked from Western trade, Muslim factions become incensed at the global master who has enslaved their societies. Yet they cannot find redress with their governments, who censor political debate with the approval of the United States. Therefore, these Muslims constitute a hopeless faction, jailed in a cultural prison that humiliates their religious faith, stifles their economy, and slaughters their youth.

The political zealots who seized a group of commercial airplanes and crashed them into the Pentagon and the World Trade Center were not trying to tear the United States apart. By damaging two of the largest symbols of Western Orientalism, they demanded that Americans focus on their dilemmas. The loss of life that occurred in New York and Washington means no more than the loss of life occurred when American-made Apache helicopters flown by Israeli pilots launched missiles into Palestinian settlements on the Gaza Strip. Yet the media continues to foster the antagonistic mentalities advanced by the Bush administration. News programs broadcast the dubious testimony of foreign relations "experts" who thrive on the United States' ignorance to Islamic cultures. American mass media ownership, wedded to government, produces vitriolic, constructions that focus on the pain of the event to stir nationalist sentiment for their own gain. Their programs portray Arabs as violent, oil-greedy racists who seek the annihilation of the United States. Without understanding the rational behind Middle Eastern outrage, Americans crucify Muslims as "terrorists" and support an administration destined to worsen the relationship between East and West.

Those whose hearts sadden at the events of Sept. 11 should cry, but they should not restrain the object of their tears to the passengers, military officers, and trade agents who died in the plane crashes. Instead of supporting President Bush's hypocritical "war on terrorism," they should temper their anger with understanding and limit American foreign interaction to the peaceful extradition of the Al Qaeda group. As violence reciprocates itself, the United States should seek a fair trial for bin Laden and his organization that excludes the death penalty as a possibility for punishment. By respecting domestic rule, Islamic nations would promote the sanctity of independent government. And in exchange for the police support of Afghanistan and other Islamic nations, America would agree to re-evaluate their foreign policy agenda and abandon their imperial obsessions. Do not let the events of Sept. 11 fuel further oppression and violence; give the crash victims' deaths meaning by demanding the proliferation of civility, both at home and abroad.

It's not easy being green

SHAWN ILLNITCH

While driving this weekend I hit a frog.

I killed the frog.

Despite my best efforts to slow down and swerve, I heard the splat as the tires of my car ended the life of another living creature, and I felt horrible.

It was Friday night. It had rained substantially during the previous 24 hours and, as usual the night after a rainy period, the frogs were crossing the road.

Shortly after hitting the first, I hit another. There was nothing I could do. The more I drove, the more frogs I hit, and the worse I felt.

I could not stop. I could not stop driving and wait for the exodus of amphibians to end. Once I had started driving I was committed. I had to finish my trip.

For their part, the frogs were not at fault either. The damp condition gave the frogs the false illusion that the road was a safe place.

Some of them hopped as fast as they can to try to avoid my tires, while some, paralyzed with fear, remained motionless in the brightness of my headlights.

If the United States' government decides that military action is necessary to "do away with terrorism," innocent citizens of countries are sure to become like the frogs that met their death with my tires.

They will try to escape harm, but they may not be able to. It is important to understand that many citizens of these countries have no control of their government. Even if the common people of Afghanistan would like to hand over Osama bin Laden to US officials, do they have the power?

President Bush said there are more than 60 nations that harbor terrorist. He said we will not stop until we have eradicated terrorism as we know it.

If military action is necessary to carry out this operation, is there any doubt that innocent people will be killed? Is our military that sophisticated that it can perform such a difficult task with no risk of mistake? Of course not.

Is America ready to kill innocent citizens in the quest to rid the world of terrorist? According to a recent Time poll, 48 percent of Americans favor massive bombings that might kill civilians is it were necessary to take out the group responsible for the World Trade Center Bombings.

Think about that for a minute. If we knew that we could kill a relatively small amount of terrorists that had some responsibility for the attacks in America, 48 percent of us would say that the lives innocent citizens of other countries would be a price that they would pay.

What did these citizens do? They live in a country, with a government that they no have no part in, which has terrorists within their borders.

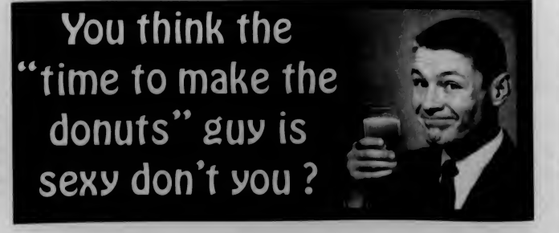
Suppose the United States starts their campaign and realizes that innocent civilians are dying, would they be able to stop and rethink their action? So, like me driving my car, once the United States starts attacking, there is no turning back. They are committed.

Another disadvantage of war is that we (the United States) cannot accurately predict the consequences. I assume that the government figures once we try to throw out oppressive governments, the people of that country will vote for America, for our ideals and our freedom. What happens, however, if, once they see a couple of their brothers or sisters die, the citizens of that country develop a hatred of America, and joins the battle of their country.

"There will be no uniforms, nothing to distinguish those we are fighting the war against and those that we are not."

There will be no uniforms, nothing to distinguish those we are fighting the war against and those that we are not. More innocent people are sure to die.

I offer no clear solution as to how we should seek justice for the innocent lives lost when the World Trade Centers collapsed, but the United States is not ready to start military action.



Even if a strike began in two weeks, could our country have developed a foolproof plan for such a complicated mission?

The United States must be careful and not let anger guide its reaction to a terrible act.

As the rain was coming down, I knew I would kill more frogs. My situation was different, though, as innocent citizens in other countries are not frogs. They are people, human beings, with families and dreams and all the rest.

I, as one American, could not accept the responsibility of if not intentionally, knowingly killing innocent people on a crusade for justice. That is not justice.

Upcoming Jams

By Dave Siegel
Collegian Staff

As the weather begins to get a little chilly and the leaves are beginning to turn all sorts of different colors, we must come to realize that summer is over and that it is now fall. As we have had many great opportunities to see some amazing music this past summer, the season change brings even more chances to see some of our favorite bands. As most fall tours are slated to begin in the next two weeks, Northampton yet again is the site for many of the kick-off dates. This coming week, we have the opportunity to see many old favorites as well as some brand new faces in the jamband scene.

Wednesday night, Deep Banana Blackout makes their way to the big ballroom at the Pearl Street Nightclub. These masters of funk return to Pearl Street after a strong summer with many festival appearances including both Terrapin presentations, The Gathering of the Vibes and The Summit. Having played Northampton last March, DBB is certainly no stranger to Pearl Street. They always put on a hell of a show.

As excited as I am to see DBB, I am almost more excited to see the opener Robert Randolph and the Family Band. This band comprised of Robert Randolph on the steel pedal guitar along with his cousins Danyell Morgan on bass and Marcus Randolph on drums with John Ginty on organ and piano is the brightest new band on the jamband scene and surely will not disappoint.

Randolph seized national acclaim this past summer with an all-star band called The Word, where he played along side legendary keyboardist John Medeski of Medeski, Martin and Wood. This group had many great performances, including a breathtaking set at Berklest. If you happened to miss this show, Robert Randolph and the Family Band will make their Northampton headlining debut at Pearl Street on November 1. Be sure to get there early as the opener will be getting on at about 8:30 p.m.

On Thursday you can take a break and catch your breath in anticipation of a killer weekend. At 10 p.m. Friday night at the Iron Horse, amazing guitarist Keller Williams will attempt to repeat his sold out performance last spring. He brings a very unique style of performance with him that always makes for an enjoyable show.

One of my favorite performers on the scene today, Keller melds together breathtaking originals like "Inhale to the Chief" and "Kidney in a Cooler," both off his latest live release titled Loop with some great covers including the Grateful Dead's "Scarlet Begonias" and David Bowie's "Fame," just to name a few. After coming off a big summer where he joined the So Many Roads Tour with Karl Denson's Tiny Universe, Rusted Root, and Ratdog. Keller puts on an astonishing solo performance with the use of a looping machine that enables him to lay down multiple tracks on top of each other, which produces a sound that many full size bands can not come close to producing. He will be at the University of Hartford performing a free show tonight if you simply cannot wait until Friday to see him. I know that he certainly is worth the short drive.

On Saturday, the culmination of a phenomenal week will occur with an awesome line-up at the smaller clubroom at Pearl Street Nightclub. Making their headlining debut will be the funky Addison Groove Project. Almost as impressive as their music is the fact that all but one of this six-piece band are currently full-time students at colleges in the Northeast while also holding down a pretty hefty touring schedule. With members hailing from Wellesley, these guys are certainly students of the local scene. They bring with them a tremendously groovy, polished, robust sound that would be expected of musicians twice their age. These guys boast an amazing horn section blaring out some solid horn arrangement, laced over some breathtaking bass foundation. Bring your dancing shoes, as

On the outside looking into art world

By Martha Olivo
Collegian Correspondent

Outsider art is a term originally reserved for those works that are created by people without formal training or any connection to the art world. How, then, is it possible for the Hampden Gallery to be hosting an exhibition of outsider art?

Outsider art is the English equivalent of the French term Art Brut, coined by Jean Dubuffet in 1948, to mean art by non-artists. Outsider art, as illustrated by the current exhibition at the Hampden Gallery entitled Other Ways of Seeing: An Exhibition of Outsider Art, has taken on a broader meaning. It now refers to any work completed by someone on the fringes of society. In the case of the Hampden's exhibit, the folks on the fringe are developmentally and/or psychiatrically disabled students in Paris. These eight students produce their art as a means, not only of self-expression, but of financial gain as well. That is to say they are working artists.

With the exception of four works by Yves Pous, the main theme of the show is color. Many of the works have a mosaic quality, their surfaces divided into small sections of abstract design or jumbled with figures placed this way and that. There is little concern here for the portrayal of depth— the works are without exception flat, the figures abstracted, often with arms of exaggerated length. The effectiveness of these works varies greatly with each artist.

Gerard N'Guyen has two sets of paintings in the show. The first, a row of three untitled works, follows the Synthetic Cubist habit of placing lettering on the work's surface, in N'Guyen's case, the entire alphabet. His second set of paintings, two works entitled "Compositions One and Two," are reminiscent of works by Mark Rothko. Rothko's works were, in his words, "flat forms" that "reassert the picture plane...destroy illusion and reveal truth." They were essentially panels of color that were, in Rothko's day, appreciated for their position at the extreme of abstraction, and are today adored for the sheer beauty of their colors. N'Guyen's lush red that leaks across the canvas of "Composition Two" is not pushing the boundaries of the medium of painting, but is, like Rothko's work, stunning simply for its colorful saturation.

A few of the artists have produced works that effectively employ repetition. Pascale Gourdin has repeated figures with human-like heads and sky-scraper-like bodies built of colorful bricks that recur across the painting's surface. Sophie Iolivet's work entitled "Quai de Garc" is a canvas divided into 14 rectangles of equal size, each filled with abstractions in a palette of muted, but nonetheless various, colors.

The one artist in the exhibit who does not make use of color, Yves Pous, has a set of two works, each of which is in turn a set of two faces/figures. These works are among the most compelling of the show. The lack of color in "Tete Noir et Banc 1 et 2" forces the viewer to pay closer attention to the content of the works.

Pous's black and white compositions are of three heads, and a human figure, respectively. The first of the heads is surrounded by flowers, and the second is encircled by bug-like creatures. The third head sports an exuberant facial expression and is surrounded by both flowers and creatures. The fourth and final square contains a whole person whose head is encircled by creatures whose own heads are encircled by creatures. One wonders what sort of day compels the artist to paint swirling creatures instead of flowers and just what type of creatures they are.

In viewing and writing about Other Ways of Seeing, I have chosen to place these works in the continuum of art history, comparing them to the works of various prominent abstract artists. However, at an exhibit of true Outsider Art (a designation I would argue does not exist within a gallery), one should probably take the works for what they, alone, are, without consideration for how they compare or fit in to the artistic establishment.

On the contrary, I believe that a spectator's experience is enhanced by his or her ability to put a work in context. Admittedly, these works, having been executed by disabled people very much outside the sometimes elitist world of art, may not rightfully be academically poked and prodded in the way a work by a well-studied and trained artist should be. But if they do not manage to move or at the very least, amuse the spectator, they have no business being on gallery walls at all. Part of this reviewer's amusement comes from comparing any work—be it a painting, a meal or a massage—to that which has come before. That said, one might consider Cubism and other extremes of abstraction or simply soak up the colors and unique images of the Hampden Gallery's current exhibition. Either way, I think you will find a show that is, in turns, strikingly colorful and unremarkable. Go for the color and to see the Outside world for yourself, at the Hampden Gallery, Southwest Residential Area, through September 30.

Live gets edgy, Moonspell's got sexy vampires

MOONSPELL
Darkness and Hope
Century Media

Metal and goth as genres would seem to have little in common, but there is one characteristic that they inherently share: it is really easy for them to cross that fine line into simple silliness. Bands that blend the genres have to pull double duty to avoid falling into camp, and even the best groups sometimes fall short. Look at Type O Negative, probably the greatest goth metal band ever: they craft the amazing "Christian Woman" and drop the hilarious "Be My Druidess," both with equally straight faces.

Moonspell walk that line throughout their new album Darkness and Hope, coming up with mixed results but a definite tendency to stay on the good side of the abyss.

When they hit, they hit in all the right places. "Firewalking" is a great song, with a metaled-out chorus ("Come firewalking inside of me... when everything falls apart!" screams lead singer Fernando Ribiero in his best Phil Anselmo impression) and a high-energy rhythm riff carrying the song throughout its concise three minutes. Indeed, even a vampire song like "Rapaces," which desperately tries to fall into the hilariously bad category, maintains its grasp as a legitimately good tune. It's hard to make a vampire song sexy these days (it's just been done, you know?) (I really hope some of you are nodding right now) but a key intro sample and a chorus that will not leave your mind ("Not all vampires suck blood! Not all of them died for love!") get the job done with style.

I'm not even going to go into the inherent awesomeness of a gothed-out version of the Ozzy classic "Mr. Crowley." That just speaks for itself.

Of course, there's also "Devilried" (actual chorus: "She wears Devil Red! She wears Devil Red!") and "Ghostsong" to bring the production down to the level of any mesh-shirt "life is pain" whiny face-painted dweeb you might meet, but I suppose one cannot expect it all to be good. Someone must like this stuff, but, to be honest, I haven't watched The Crow enough for that person to be me.

Portuguese goth metal has reached a new apex. (Or at least I think it has. This is the only Portuguese goth metal I've ever heard.) With more songs inspiring the hope of good music than the darkness of camp, Moonspell have an overall winner. (Rob Schulze)

LIVE
MCA Records

When a band decides to title their record a number, it seems that they are setting themselves up. The name implies some sort of connection to their previous work. Live was able to make the title of their new album, V, work, as it is a culmination of their previous four releases.

The new album is different. It is easily their edgiest album to date. There is, however, no song that sticks out and grabs the listener's attention. There is no instant hit or song that the audience will remember the album by.

Live has, though, captured a moment. Just as "Lightening Crashes" from Throwing Copper can remind people of the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995, "Overcome" on V may remind people of the terrorist attack of 2001, as it has been featured on VH1 while images of the collapsed World Trade Center buildings were seen in the background.

While "Overcome" is a ballad of sorts, the rest of the album, with the exception of maybe two songs, is an edgy, powerful ride.

Only one song seems to be out of place, the soft synthesizer lead "Call me a fool." While the rest of the album seems to have some power, this track comes dangerously close to killing the energy. The follow-up, "Flow" brings back the energy with a very catchy chorus.

As stated earlier, V does not have one track that stands out, instead having a balanced attack of powerful songs. It is Live's most interesting release to date. (Shawn Ilnitch)

Waste of Skin
Portrait/Columbia

I mean, there isn't anything really wrong with Spike 1000's debut album, Waste of Skin. It does not offend with its riffs, or the vocals, or the lyrics.

Of course, the riffs could be a little more complicated. And the vocals could be a little less generic, a little more personalized. And the lyrics could be a tad more inventive, or clever, or complicated. But they aren't.

It's just that this CD goes through you like bland Chinese food. It's OK when it's going down – it doesn't offend your taste buds, you don't think it's gross or throw it away. You just eat until you're finished. The problem is that a half hour later it comes right back out, leaving no trace. And you really don't want to have it again for a while.

I've listened to Waste of Skin several times now, and I can't think of anything really bad to say about it. I also can't think of any praise. Nothing really sticks in my memory at all. It's there and then its gone, and you aren't improved or weakened for the listening.

In the end, there's one anecdote that says it all about Spike 1000. The first time I popped it into my CD player and let it roll, I was reading, and cleaning my room, and otherwise amusing myself with my pathetic existence. I suddenly thought to myself, "Man, this is a really long CD." I checked the song, and it said that it was on track 5, "Element." That's when I realized that I had my player programmed to repeat, and it had already played the whole CD and the first four songs again, and I hadn't even noticed.

KAIMAH
Swamplord
Century Media

A large portion of the extreme metal from Scandinavia that makes its way to the States suffers from ridiculous vocals, a heightened sense of self-importance, and insanely pretentious ambient noise that the esteemed Rob Schulze correctly identified as "hooting owls and what sounds like cats giving birth." Occasionally, the atmospherics, hostile vocals, and ambitious outlook do combine to form something worthwhile, but most of the time we get something like Bal-Sagoth (who, wouldn't you know, aren't even from there).

Finland's Kalmah has no time for this crap. Well, they do have time for silly demonic vocals about halfway through their debut Swamplord, but otherwise this is a brilliantly executed, straightforward blast of quality metal. The vocals aren't even that important, as this is first and foremost a musicians' record. There are so many insanely good riffs hurled at the listener during this album's 36 minutes that you'll wonder why most extreme metal bands can't muster up half as many in twice the running time. And the comparatively brief running time makes it all the sweeter. There isn't a wasted moment on this disc; it just does what it came to do and leaves you floored.

Kalmah wears their Iron Maiden influences proudly (coulda sworn for the opening of "Withering Away" was "Out of the Silent Planet"), but like many of the bands that have come after, they soup up Maiden's guitars to a dizzying speed. As a result, the songs sound much heavier and fuller, but also very busy and lacking personality. You never forget Maiden songs, they have way too much personality. With Kalmah, as great as the playing is, individual song structure and definition takes a back seat to the overall battering ram feel of the entire album. It's hard to complain, though, when on "Heritance of Berijia" the sky sounds like it has opened up and is raining down fiery metal riffs from above. Highly recommended. (Michael Delano)

40 BELOW SUMMER
Invitation to the Dance
London-Sire

40 Below Summer presents: MYOCNMA (Make Your Own Crappy Nü-Metal Album).

Before beginning: grow facial hair and/or a robust mane, ask record company for an advance to purchase piercings and tattoos, acquire girlfriend and break up with her (lyrical inspiration), allow considerable amount of angst to well up inside you.

Step One: Choose crappy band name, preferably with numbers or a deliberate misspelling of an existing word.

Step Two: Although this usually comes much later, might as well start brainstorming now about half-assed cover art and book insert, possibly featuring an old man screaming with his tongue out holding a pseudo tarot card. Book time with photographer for chance to scowl, look off into the distance, and/or not smile, with the location to be dimly lit and desolate. Lyrics in booklet should be printed in handwritten style to fully communicate the pain and loneliness that went into writing them. Optional: print only partial song lyrics so as to a) save people from being taken aback by the power of the full lyrics or b) promote the website by only posting the full lyrics there.

Step Three: Write some appropriate song titles (don't worry if you don't have lyrics yet, they'll all fall into place). "Wither Away," "Falling Down," "Rejection," "Drown," and "Minus One" all seem to fit the bill. Create back-up list in case of emergency ("Puke," "Shin Kick," "Vortex of Pain," "Fatal Exception," "Don't Invade My Private Moment").

Step Four: Tap well of pain created from breaking up with girlfriend for lyrics. "Would you cut me if you love me." "Rot bitch I'm gonna make you rot." "your thoughts can't tread into my disclosure."

Step Five: Bang out some generic nü-metal sounds, characterized by incessant scream/sing vocal changing, no guitar solos or non-boring ass riffs that haven't been heard a thousand times, and drawn-out mid-sections with minimal moody instrumentation as backdrop for grunts and tortured utterances. Cover a delectably campy 70s or 80s hit song available for use on album or as B-side on exclusive import single.

Presto! (Michael Delano)

LOS STRAITJACKETS
Sing Along With Los Straitjackets
Cavalcade

Maybe the Los Straitjackets are just a simple surf-rock group out of land-locked Tennessee. Maybe.

After all, how many other Nashville natives play surf-rock under Mexican Lucha-Libre masks? How many can claim a performer named Caveman? How many have made an entire career of albums without vocals?

It is only on Sing Along With Los Straitjackets that the Straitjackets introduce vocalists, all from other bands. El Vez, the Mexican Elvis, stops by to record a track, as does Mike Campbell, from Tom Petty's Heartbreakers, and the Reverend Horton Heat. Ditto for Leigh Nash (from Sixpence None the Richer), Nick Lowe and Dave Alvin.

you will need them.

I expect this show to be another club-room steamer, as Bay Area favorites Garaj Mahal will open the show. Garaj Mahal is made up of four world-class musicians: Kai Eckhardt on bass, Fareed Haque of Blue Note fame on guitar, keyboardist Eric Levy and sought after Bay Area drummer Alan Hertz. Garaj Mahal fuses many different musical styles together to make a very tight, improvisational sound. Please come early, as you will not be disappointed. Garaj Mahal takes the stage around 8:30 p.m.

Also of interest on Saturday night is the always entertaining Howie Day bringing his brand of acoustic guitar mastery to the Iron Horse for an early show at 7 p.m. Enjoy all of this great music, as weekends like this are not bound to happen often.

It's fairly obvious that Sing Along With... is the first album the Straitjackets have featured vocalist-on. There are obvious ups and downs throughout the record, with the Nashville band seemingly de-emphasizing its own musical prowess to let the singers shine. That's definitely unfortunate as the Straitjackets' ability to craft catchy surf-songs is undeniable. If they'd only been able to blend the vocalist and the music better, the listener wonders detectedly.

All hope is not lost. When everything does come together, as it definitely does at several points on the album, the end result is fantastic. Raul Malo's rendition of "Black is Black" sounds downright funky. The Mavericks lead-singer seems unsure of himself at the outset, but settles into a confident, playful tone for the rest of the song. Mark Lindsay's "Treat Her Right" is surfed out perfection — it is here that the Straitjackets find a singer who doesn't overwhelm its own playing.

It is on the album's final track "The End of the World," a decidedly un-Straitjackets track — that the album finally comes together, featuring Nash. "World" is a slow ballad, delicately delivered by the diminutive Texas singer. It certainly doesn't sound anything like most Jackets tracks, but that's ok.

If the band is going to be doing something new, maybe it's good that they're going to try a new sound. They clearly haven't worked out all the kinks, but as long as Los Straitjackets can maintain its high level of musicianship, the band can fool around with vocalists all they want.

RICHIE HAWTIN
DJ-9 closer to the edit
Novamute

Richie Hawtin might be a technotica pioneer — that's what www.mute.com, his website suggests — but he certainly doesn't look the part. Wearing all black, a gray tie and intellectual eyeglasses, he looks like a nerd.

He might very well be, that doesn't change the quality of his music. His latest, DJ-9 closer to the edit, is for lack of a better cliche, an electronic tour-de-force. After the critical acclaim of 1999's Decks, FX & 909, Hawtin decided to take his own unique style even further. Generously borrowing from other DJs, Hawtin sampled some 100 tracks, pared them down into slices of sound, 300 in all, and combined them all into what sounds like a one continuous track.

Climbing slowly through the album's 51 tracks, and clocking in at a modest 54 minutes, it would be easy to dismiss the album's gimmicky nature. But DJ-9 skips and pops, moving and running on the beats. Hawtin shows a knack for knowing when it has gone on too long, carefully avoiding techno music's main failing: repetition. At a certain point, a DJ can't avoid treading on the same ground as his contemporaries. But that doesn't excuse the DJ who doesn't seem to care, who offers listeners only the beats, over and over and without subtlety.

Not Hawtin. His rhythm shifts are impressive and while he keeps a steady driving tone for the album, he doesn't let the listener think that the CD is skipping. Perhaps the only drawback to the album is in the latter tracks. Sampled singing sounds silly. No matter how many times it's noted, techno music featuring vocalists that isn't mixed by Moby is awful. Hawtin's mixed vocals sound no better.

Fortunately, the vocals are rare. And when nobody's singing, Hawtin has shown a depth of talent worth listening to. (Sam Wilkinson)

Attacks put sports in perspective

They're reading names out over the radio
All the folks the rest of us won't get to know
Sean and Julia, Gareth, Ann and Breda
Their lives are bigger, than any big idea
—U2

Two weeks ago yesterday I drove to my 9 a.m. class full of hope and pride. On that day my first column of the year appeared in these pages and I thought it was going to be the start of something big. I had imagined walking down to the Collegian office after my class and finding hundreds of comments on our web page praising the column and its author. I was proud of what I had written; it was humorous, thought provoking and full of obscure references. I had set out to craft something that everybody would read and enjoy and I believed that I had succeeded.

However, because of events happening just a few hours away I don't know how many people actually read my column. That day was September 11, 2001 and I'm sure that most people did not read the Collegian that day. Even I didn't.

Suddenly it didn't matter whether the Patriots had lost to the Bengals or the Red Sox were as good as finished in the playoff race. Sports had become secondary and we all knew it. These attacks had forced the world to stop, but just for a moment. As a nation we needed to get back up, and we did. These attacks left a wound on the American psyche, a wound that will only heal with time.

I was reminded of this exactly one week later when I returned to work at Fenway Park. Security was tightened and extra police were visibly present. Just as visible were a plethora of American flags and signs echoing pro-American sentiments. During the rousing singing of the "National Anthem" and "God Bless America" before the game I stood with the visiting Tampa Bay Devil Rays in front of their dugout and noticed small children waving the stars and stripes from their seats and grown men crying both in the stands and on the field; and I joined them. Never had I seen so many people united behind a common cause before the game had even begun.

After a Boston firefighter and Boston cop threw out the ceremonial first pitch, I could not help but think of their brothers in New York who had given their lives trying to save others. When you are the only one walking up a narrow stairway with everybody going down you must fight your natural instinct to join them and save yourself. These men had a job to do and they did it to the very end.

One of these men is named Gerard Nevins. He was a firefighter in New York on Rescue 1. His unit was one of the first to arrive at the scene and he has not been heard from since. He had called his wife earlier that morning saying that his shift was done and he was just waiting for his replacement to come in, he would be home soon. Despite all this, he responded when duty called for that was his job.

While nobody knows exactly what happened to Gerry in the ensuing hours, I would like to think that he gave his life saving and trying to save others. He went into the smoke and the darkness and he made a difference, he always did. Whatever he did, he always made a difference. I wish that all of you had gotten to see Gerry as I had. He was a husband, a father and a friend. I miss him.

When I returned to my home in East Bridgewater on Thursday night after another Red Sox game, one of the first things that I saw was a stack of pictures of Gerry. There he was happy and smiling, his whole life ahead of him. It just didn't seem right that he was now gone. The final picture was one of my brother and I with the Twin Towers behind us and at that moment this tragedy truly hit me. He gave his life running up step after step of these enormous structures trying to save the lives of others. He had to have known the danger and peril that was all around him, but he put it behind him and carried on.

It is men like Gerry who have made myself and many others rethink our hero worship of professional athletes. Sure Mark McGwire can belt 70 homers and Michael Jordan can amaze us time and again on the basketball court, but this is simply entertainment. These men play a game. True, they play it better than almost anybody else and that should be commended, but it is still just a game.

True heroism was on display in the streets of New York City and Arlington, Va. on the 11th. Men were risking their own lives to save those of others, others who they had probably never met. I never got to tell Gerry how much respect I have for him and people everywhere who do what he did. People who put the lives of others before their very own, people like my father.

He is a captain on the Boston Fire Department. He goes into work each and every day and puts his life on the line protecting others. Sadly it has taken a tragedy like this for me to see how important he really is. I would like to think that he would have done just as Gerry did on that fateful day. I know he would, because he is a hero. I consider myself lucky that I get the chance to tell him this everyday, and I wish that I told him more often for I know Danny and Andrew, Gerry's two sons, would give everything for the chance to say it just once more to their dad.

At every game now at Fenway Park, after the top half of the third inning, Lee Greenwood's patriotic anthem "Proud to be an American" is played through the PA system. People stand and people sing and people wave flags proudly and it brings a tear to the eye of even the coldest of souls. It has taken a national tragedy to bring us all together. Not as Red Sox fans or Yankee fans, but as Americans. Let's do what we can to make it last. None of us will ever forget this day and those who gave their lives but we must walk on and rebuild. We will get through this, together. One nation, under god, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

Justin Pearson is a Collegian columnist and proud to be an American.

Perhaps it's the idea of besting a group of individuals known for their brains, especially in a sport where thinking on your feet often spells the difference between success and failure. Hopwood, another player whose roots lie close to Cambridge, thinks the Minutewomen are better equipped for the mind game of field hockey than their Crimson counterparts.

"We have more street smarts, which are what you need in field hockey games," said the Lexington native. "It's not about academics when you're out on the field."

Hopefully it's not too much about your roots, either, because the players aren't the only ones who will have come face-to-face with the past tonight at Jordan Field.

Iris deHamer

Kristen Hopwood

In what seems to be a trend for Northeast field hockey, the two coaches in tonight's match up will share much more than just sideline duties. Shea and Harvard's Sue Caples were teammates at UMass when the Minutewomen reached the NCAA championship game in 1981.

"If anything, it just makes you proud to see so many alums of the program go on to hold coaching positions in the sport," Shea said earlier in the season.

Why is no one rooting for Barry Bonds?

One of the best sportscaster terms is "water cooler talk" — that translates into English as occurrences, usually in sports, that are interesting enough for people to feel compelled to talk about them during the next workday. This term is especially effective when the workers gabbing aren't the sports fanatics that you and I are.

When Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa were chasing Roger Maris' homerun record of 61 in 1998, it seemed that everyone in the country was buzzing over the prospects of having a new homerun king. I worked for an IT company that summer and the only thing everyone wanted to talk about was the homerun chase and when Mark McGwire ran his total all the way up to 70, it was a feat that many journalists and baseball fans attribute to having reestablished baseball as the national pastime. It was also a number many saw as untouchable.

Now that a player, Barry Bonds, considered one of the greatest of all-time, is almost guaranteed to break this seemingly unbreakable record, a rational person would expect a good amount of "water cooler talk" and love from baseball fans across the nation. But that just isn't the case.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Captain wins A-10 award

Men's soccer captain Bryan O'Quinn (above) was named A-10 Player of the Week after posting shutouts in both of UMass's wins, a 2-0 nail biter over UNH and a 7-0 thrashing of Maine.

At press time, Bonds was just three homeruns shy of Big Mac's 70 with 11 games to go. Barring serious injury, it is a virtual lock that Willie Mays' godson will become the single-season homerun king, but the population has replied with a "whatever." Why?

1) The tragic events that took place on Sept. 11 changed the way Americans look at everything, including their pastime. Now sport is just entertainment and players are just players. We have all learned what real heroes are: firefighters, EMTs, and police officers. The citizenry doesn't feel like idolizing someone just because he can hit a baseball into McGwire Cove.

This argument doesn't hold water for one simple reason. Before 9/11, Bonds was already within striking distance of 70, and no one cared then, either. While it is not helping the situation, the terrorist attacks are not the reason that so few are rooting for, or talking about, Barry Bonds.

2) Since Bonds plays on the West Coast, everyone in the east doesn't get to enjoy the Baseball Tonight updates every time he comes to the plate the way we did in '98 with Sosa and McGwire. It is harder to root for someone when you can't do so live while hoping to witness history.

This is probably half of the reason that most of us don't really care. I will definitely be staying up late every night, however, when he gets within a dinger or two of the record. It is history, after all.

3) The race card.

No. I will not give that argument a second thought. It is simply ridiculous. No. No. No. No. No. Please don't make that argument.

4) People don't like Barry Bonds. It began when he was a Pirate in Pittsburgh and has continued ever since. It is very hard to root for a guy like Barry Bonds. He has a constant swagger. He has his own little cubicle-type-area within the Giants clubhouse. He has pictures of himself on his wristbands and his own teammates don't even like him.

Bingo. When McGwire was drilling balls out of parks, fans (with the exception of yours truly) believed they were watching a humble, decent guy. The fans wanted this "nice guy" to break the record. When you watch Barry, you think, "wow this guy is a real jerk, I hope he strikes out every time he gets to the plate."

Some call him misunderstood. I call him a disgrace who only cares about personal statistics and bragging rights along with his father (former Giant great Bobby Bonds) and his godfather (best player ever, Willie Mays).

Realizing that Bonds will break the record, there is only one thing that cheers me up, knowing how much fun it will be to root for the next guy to erase him from the record book.

Michelle Luttati, No. 21, is the second consecutive UMass women's soccer player to win A-10 Player of the Week. The sophomore scored the game-winner in Saturday's 3-1 victory over Rhode Island.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may have a sexy Libra figure, as all Libras do.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may not be able to make a quick start today, but once the wheels get rolling you can certainly make yourself useful to yourself and others. So get your Big Wheel and get rolling.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You're going to have to go the distance today if your work is to have the real impact you are going for at this time. Walk out of class so your friend will graduate, and remember Donna Martin graduates!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – A get-together with old friends can prove more than enjoyable to you; the ideas you share may lead to something quite profitable in the end. The reunion of your high school band will start out successful, then the drummer will take all the credit.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Collaborative efforts are favored today, but you may have to be the one to come up with the most successful, hard-hitting ideas.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Things are looking peachy today. Watch out for underpasses and screaming children.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – If you play with fire you're bound to get burned, but at least you'll still be hot.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're quick to anger and slow to forgive. If you really can't be nice, at least leave an opening for a friend to get a little before making fun of that girls pants.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You will be in no mood for the kind of restrictions to which you have been bound in the past, but you mustn't let yourself be too rebellious.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – So your boyfriend breaks up with you before your one-year anniversary. Don't be sad, it's a blessing in disguise. Consider the monetary benefits.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – What you need and what you want are not likely to be reconciled today until you realize that you are in charge of much more than routine matters. If it wasn't for Despres you'd never get laid.

Last year it took a single UMass goal to beat Harvard at Jordan Field. That happens to be the exact number of goals Ashley Gilbert (shooting) has scored in her UMass career.

Back to basics

Field hockey focuses on honing skills

By Adam White

Apparently, Bo don't know field hockey either.

After watching her team split with No.4 Michigan and winless Indiana over the weekend, Massachusetts head coach Patty Shea came up with a simple plan for the team's next game tonight at Harvard: simply follow the lead of the once esteemed Mr. Jackson.

In other words, work on every other sport but field hockey.

"One of our biggest problems is that we'd rather practice the spectacular than the basic; we'd rather practice the dunk than the free throw," Shea said. "I keep telling them that you're not going to get too many chances in a game to dunk, especially if you're only 5-foot-5."

And when your adversary is a team that made last year's NCAA tournament with a single conference loss, it pays to work on your pigskin prowess as well.

"The key is basic skills, and the key to basic skills is repetition," Shea said. "If you don't punt the ball over and over in practice, you're not going to be able to get off that pooch kick when you need it in a game."

It will take more than free throws and pooch kicks for UMass (2-3) to emerge victorious against the Crimson (2-2). The two teams locked horns last year in a classic battle that went to double overtime before a Patty Robinson goal in the 94th minute of play gave UMass the 1-0 win.

"Last year was a great game, one that either team could have won," said Maroon and White sophomore Kristen Hopwood. "I think because of that Harvard is going to have a lot of intensity. It's definitely going to be interesting."

The Crimson player most responsible for last year's nail biter was keeper Katie Zacarian, who racked up a school-record 19 saves in the defeat. A native of Amherst, Zacarian drew plenty of attention from Shea during a standout high-school career that landed her on both the under-16 and under-19 U.S. national teams.

Shea said that Zacarian's decision to move on to the Ivy League instead of joining forces with her hometown program had less to do with UMass than it did with the player's desire to get a break from the Pioneer Valley.

"It makes sense; you grow up here, you kind of want to see new places. It's understandable," Shea said.

Interestingly enough, certain UMass players who grew up close to Cambridge view the annual Harvard game as another kind of escape: a chance to tear down their idols a bit by beating a program they grew up admiring. Sophomore midfielder Iris deHamer watched many Boston area college programs while putting together a solid career of her own at Hamilton-Wenham Regional High School.

"It means a lot to finally be on the same field with these teams that I grew up watching," said deHamer, who earned team MVP honors as a senior captain at HWRHS. "Beating them is special. And there's something about Harvard that makes it even better."

'Air' Jordan will fly again

Basketball's greatest-ever dismisses retirement for a second time

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

[illegible] happened

[illegible] his man's career everything has [illegible] roads should we be surprised?

[illegible] parting game ceased as Michael Jordan [illegible] of the world that he will make his [illegible] to the NBA and play for the Washington Wizards.

In a statement released by his management agency, Jordan announced: "I am returning as a player to the game I love."

Up until Friday, Jordan was a partial owner and team president of the Wizards organization. NBA rules state that you cannot compete on the court if you are the owner of the team. As a result, the former NBA superstar sold his shares and resigned as president.

The five-time league MVP signed a two-year contract with Washington worth the league minimum for veterans with over ten years of experience. For two years he has been giving up the millions of dollars in contracts. Now, once again, he is the second-year man.

His management agency also announced that Jordan will donate his entire salary from the upcoming season to the relief agencies working with the victims in the Washington D.C. and New York City attacks of September 11th.

Jordan wanted to make the announcement official Monday but was unable to because of some last minute business decisions.

From the time he was a player, to an owner, now back to a player, Jordan has built a monopoly in the advertising industry. He has become successful by selling himself. The King of Commercials had to clear up a licensing agreement with one of his many sponsors – video game mogul EA Sports – before he could officially sign a contract with the Wizards.

One man who is overjoyed by the return of arguably the best player ever to touch a basketball court is NBA commissioner, David Stern. He told ESPN.com that "I am happy to welcome Michael Jordan, the player, back to the NBA, although, as commissioner, I am sorry to lose him in the board room."

"Michael has always brought joy to basketball fans around the world, and, in these difficult times, we can all use a little more joy in our lives," Stern added.

There has been continuous speculation that Jordan was thinking of making a comeback for some time now. It started at the end of the 2000-2001 NBA campaign when he told Sports Illustrated columnist Rick Reilly that he wanted to form a team in Washington that would be made up of pro hoops' veterans such as Charles Barkley, Patrick Ewing and himself.

Keeping in mind that Jordan said he was "99.9% sure" there would not be another comeback after his retired from the Chicago Bulls in 1999, sports writers believed that Jordan was merely teasing the media. They obviously were mistaken.

Jordan worked diligently all summer with the hope of polishing the skills that have dazzled fans for the past two decades. Rigorous exercise and the occasional pick-up games against some of the NBA's elite like Michael Finley and Anfernee "Penny" Hardaway, gave people clues that Jordan's return would become a reality.

One of his close observers was recently hired Wizards head coach Doug Collins. In an ironic chain of events, Collins will now be coaching the man who hired him for the job after he had been out of coaching for a couple of years. What will the dynamics of that relationship be?

There are a lot of other questions to be answered as well.

For starters, how good will number 23 perform? His body bares the scars of 38 years of life and 14 strenuous years in the NBA. He has been plagued by minor injuries during many of his pick-up games including a couple cracked ribs and a sprained ankle. What will happen when he goes up for a rebound and gets an elbow from Shaquille O'Neal or Tim Duncan?

The next question to be asked is, will Jordan be able to play alongside inexperienced players?

Last year, the Wizards were 19-63 on the year and did not even come close to making the playoffs.

All of these questions will start to be answered October 30, when Jordan and the Wizards open the regular season against one of his long time rivals, the New York Knicks, in the Big Apple.

Make sure you tune into the game. You might see something unbelievable.

Amherst in agua

The No. 13 Massachusetts men's water polo team padded its record even more with three wins over the weekend.

UMass (10-1, 9-1 CWPA) dominated three in-state rivals, outscoring its opponents by a total score of 34-16. The Minutemen's first victim was the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Andre Nyce netted a hat trick to pace the Maroon and White to a 16-8 win over the Beavers in the first game.

Senior Mike Foley tallied four goals in a 14-6 rout of Boston College in the second game of the weekend.

The third and final match up was a defensive battle between the Minutemen and No. 17 Harvard. Stalwart goaltender J.R. VanderWall made 11 saves and held the Crimson to only two goals, as UMass picked up a 4-2 win.

The Maroon and White will bring its nearly unblemished record into Pratt Pool at Amherst College tonight to take on Brown.

The Bears come into the contest with a 4-3 record thanks mostly to its performance in the recent Connecticut College tournament. With wins over CC, Kings Point and Iona the Bears managed to move over .500 for the first time all year.

They will however, have to bring the "A" game to Amherst if they hope to compete with the high-powered, highly ranked UMass squad.

Game time is set for 7 p.m

Long lines at blood drive donors still want to help

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst community lined up once again to give blood during an American Red Cross blood drive yesterday. Many were turned away late in the day, either by staff or by the sign outside of the Campus Center Auditorium, where the nine donor beds were set up.

"The Red Cross is no longer taking blood donations today due to the high volume of people already waiting to donate," the hand marked sign read. "Please understand that the urgent need for blood has been met, but we will need your help in the months to come. Thank you for your overwhelming support."

The drive, much like the one held last week, was a success, registered nurse Mary Doyle said.

"This has been a wonderful response. They [the donors] waited, oh I don't know, but I bet over two hours," Doyle said. "We'll have at least 100 units by the time all these people get through."

Though the demand in New York and other places has been filled, the blood collected at UMass will go wherever its needed, after being screened in a Red Cross lab. The high turnout has been beneficial to keeping blood stores high, said Barry Sullivan, a Mobile Unit Attendant (MUA) for the Red Cross.

"The response has been unbelievable. I think this is one of the highest suppliers in Massachusetts," Sullivan said. "This blood is sent to wherever its needed."

The problem, MUA Louis Howe explained, is that the demand is always high.

"Well, its always been needed. They've [the hospitals] sent out a lot," Howe said. "Surpluses never last long; a day or two. We still need the donations.

"All this goes to the lab. If we have a bad car accident, we're going to need blood," Howe added. "They still need blood."

Students sat in chairs, getting screened by nurses, filling out paper work, or waiting for an open bed. Over at the canteen set up for donors by Red Cross Volunteers, donors sat munching snacks and drinking juices to replace lost blood sugars.

"This is my fifth time donating," sophomore Linguistics major Julia Hanley said. "One of my friends was on the second plane that hit the towers."

Hanley and Sarah Kashi, a freshman Mathematics major and third time donor, agree that turnout has been higher since the attacks.

"I give all the time," Kashi said. "I figured this would be a good time."

Undeclared freshman George Paglieroni sat in a chair waiting to donate.

"I just wanted to do my part. I tried going to Springfield, but the lines were too long and they told me to come back later. I've waited an hour or so," Paglieroni said. "This is my third time trying, its always been packed."

High turnouts have been the norm since the Sept. 11 attacks.

"It's been mostly students, but I've seen some faculty, some people who are employees of the university in one way or another. I've even seen some familiar faces from the community, people who own stores in Amherst," Howe said. "One thing about Americans, they're fantastic in an emergency. We generally do good here, but the past two times have been better."

HELP WANTED: now hiring students

By Jennifer Eastwood and Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

With costs of all sorts on the rise, extra money is always appreciated, and perhaps no one is in more need of it than college students. For those seeking to add to their resumes and make some of that hard-earned cash on the side, the University of Massachusetts, with its many offices, retail stores, eateries, and special needs unique to the campus, offers a wide variety of student job opportunities.

The two basic job types offered to students include work-study and non-work-study.

Paula Wheatherbe of the Student Employment Services office explained that the difference between each program is that work-study is a federally funded program made available to students through their finical aid packages, while non-work-study positions are obtainable by everyone.

Students are encouraged to work no more than 20 hours a week (that is up to eight hours in a day) while classes are in session, regardless if his or her job is work-study or not, in to ensure that students can maintain an appropriate balance between school studies and work.

However, Assistant Director of Student Employment Suzanne Schilling pointed out that during intersession, students are free to double their work time up to 40 hours a week.

As for one's payment, students usually receive their paychecks every week for the hours in which they worked the previous week and are available through their hiring department.

So sit back, relax, and read about which opportunities UMass students are already taking advantage of, and the many untapped possibilities just waiting for someone like you.

Food Service Positions

If making a reasonable income in a job with flexible hours while staying close to home is your more style, you may want to consider acquiring a position at a foodservice provider on campus. From a Mullins Center concession stand to the Berkshire Dinning Commons to the People's Market, retail food services welcome all students to a productive and flexible working environment.

Roberta Potter, Manager of the Franklin Dining Commons, explained that jobs available at dining commons (DC) across UMass include dishwashing, bussing tables, washing tables, prep cooking, serving meals, and cleaning the DC up at night, each one designed with an accommodating schedule.

"Essentially, the hours students work are built mostly around the meal hours," she added, "However, there are always people working in between then: on weekdays, weeknights, or weekends. We're pretty flexible."

According to many who work at a DC, Potter's claim holds to be true, as senior history major Shawn Slattery, now a dish room supervisor, agreed.

The best factor in working for a dining hall, said Slattery, is working a job that enables you to work around your school schedule because, in fact, it is part of school.

Slattery, who found his job simply by responding to an advertisement outside of the DC, explained, "I started [working here] last year because of the convenience of living in the dorm and it [the DC] being right there."

Now as a supervisor and carrying out more intricate jobs, such as changing the juice in the automatic machines, training new employees, and closing the DC down at night, he rests assure knowing he can easily balance class and work.

Stress management teacher brings relief to campus

By Jody Boss
Collegian Correspondent

Rajshree Patel, renowned stress management teacher, worries about students who find daydreaming during class about what they need to do afterwards or what they did last night. She worries about individuals who think about everything but what they are doing in the "Present Moment."

For those who missed the Sept. 19 talk by Patel, another teach-in is starting today. Patel is a senior stress management teacher at the Art of Living Foundation and a personal development consultant. After teaching classes in over 35 countries, Patel currently is teaching workshops in Cambridge, Chelmsford and Amherst.

Patel has already held two sessions on UMass campus this semester. Last week about 100 people attended her talk on "Living In The Present Moment." Patel was delighted to accept the invitation to come back to campus this week.

Vijay LaKamraju, a Computer Engineering Major has already attended the Art of Living course.

"The changes have only been positive, I use the tools to try to calm me down. The course helped me deal with things better," said LaKamraju. "The Art of Living course brings the talk together, puts it more in perspective. What we saw September 19 was just a small part of it."

"After the talk last week, it was pretty clear it was effective. I felt I had more of a responsibility to do more with the meditating," said Rachel Wintner, a sophomore who plans on taking the course this week. Wintner adds she hopes to learn "more concrete things that will help me deal with stress and handle everything without getting flustered about it, more peace of mind and how to relax."

The UMass Yoga and Meditation Club will be hosting the upcoming consecutive six-day class titled "Art of Living Course." The "Art of Living Course" has been held in over 130 countries, recognized by the United Nations and World Health Organization.

Over the six-day course, participants will focus on "Stress elimination, greater energy, increased awareness and fun," said Akshaye Sikand, a staff at the UMass Yoga and Meditation Club and grad student. He also says the sessions "Bring the mind to the present moment and allows you to give 100 percent in everything."

For students there is a $75 fee and $200 course fee for non-students. Deposits are now being accepted, either by check, cash, or credit card. Checks are made payable to "Art of Living." Payment can be done at the table in Campus Center concourse or contact Akshaye, at 222-7774, or Durgesh, at 885-5636. They also can be reached through e-mail at www.unix.oit.umass.edu/~asi/yoga or www.artofliving.org. Staff from the UMass Yoga Meditation Club will collect the deposits.

According to Wintner the money is not an issue. "Money won't matter, it won't make a difference in the long term. Sure I may miss the $75 for maybe a week, but the effects of this course are a deeper level that will help me with everything in my life."

After a student pays the $75 fee for the course they may repeat other future Art of Living courses for free. There will be a free introduction talk for anyone interested on today at 7:00p.m. in the UMass Campus Center 917.

Six sessions for stress elimination will be held in the UMass Lederle Graduate Tower room 1033. The event will run from September 27 to October 2. The times are Thursday and Friday, 7:00p.m. to 9:00p.m., Saturday and Sunday, 9:00a.m. to 1:00p.m., Monday and Tuesday, 7:00p.m. to 9:00p.m.

America rally pumps up patriotism

Republican Club and friends present different view

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

"We're lending support for our country to we can protect America," Jeff Bazydlo said during the rally held on the Student Union steps yesterday at noon.

The America rally was sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Republican Club, the Silent Majority, the Minuteman, CFact and the Cannabis Reform Coalition donated the flags that were being handed out.

"If this country sits back these terrorist actions are going to keep occurring," assured Republican Club President Pat DeCourcy.

Junior Psychology/Spanish major and Republican Club member Matthew Progen expressed his position very clearly. "[The United States] is asking the people's government [of Afghanistan] to turn over a man who needs to be put on trial, not out of racist hatred, but justice."

Bazydlo, in paraphrasing a Canadian reporter, expressed is dissatisfaction with American sentiment. "Many countries are helped by the United States and when the US is attacked, no one comes to help."

"I love capitalism. If you're not with us, you're against us," said graduate student Ed Cutting. "I want loyalty oaths [to the United States] from my professors."

UMass Spokeswoman Kay Scanlan feels "we need to express every point of view on this campus. A rally last week gave an alternate view of current events."

Republican Club Vice President Chris Carlozzi addressed the issue of children affected by the tragedy at the World Trade Center. "The telethon this weekend showed Muslim children and not to target them. But we're not focusing on the children of people killed in the World Trade Center, children who saw their parents go to work and not come back. People look for fault where there is none."

Meanwhile, the radio station Lazer 99.3 was scheduled to give away concert tickets as well as passes to Six Flags on the Student Union steps, but because of the rally, was diverted to the parking garage.

"It's pretty silly, they (Republican Club) don't have a high base on campus and aren't making a point with six people and a bunch of signs," observed Eric Hedges, junior sociology major.

"I can't take them seriously," said Senior Communication major Victor Dudley.

Potter certainly appeared appreciative of any help she and her staff receive from UMass students.

"This [the beginning weeks of the semester] is always a hard time for a DC because students are getting their class schedules in order, and no one is really looking for a job yet," she pointed out, citing the example of lack of dishwashers which force the DC to hand out paper plates during meal hours.

Working at a DC falls under the umbrella of working for Auxiliary Services who prides itself on providing manageable job opportunities on campus.

Sophomore political science major Michele Gretano, employed at one such job at the Blue Wall commented, "Working here is convenient, and it's very student oriented as far as your work schedule goes."

Depending on what day you many find her, Gretano works at the deli counter or as a cashier and smiles brightly when thinking about the free Smoothies entitled to Blue Wall employees.

Aside from Auxiliary Services, student run businesses such as the Greenough Sub Shop at Central, the Sylvan Snack Bar, Sweets 'N More at Orchard Hill, the Earthfoods cafe, or the People's Market provide students with the chance to work with and, more importantly, for their fellow undergraduates.

Sales Jobs

There are several jobs on campus that revolve around sales and allow students to thrive in a business-type environment.

At Follet, the bookstore on campus, employees can either work in the textbook annex or in one of three locations within the Campus Center. According to Val Grimm, a cashier at the store, the work environment is positive and the store pays good wages, which is a nice attraction for students looking for a job. She explained that the social aspect of her job was a benefit and that her supervisors also made her job worthwhile.

"You get to meet lots of people," she said. "And the supervisors are really nice. They will do everything that you have to do, they are down in the trenches with us."

If you are really looking for a real business environment, Campus Design and Copy could be the place for you. The organization, which is a student run business currently employs 14 workers that all work together as equals to run the business.

"Its really challenging, we put so much energy into working here," Katelyn Hinson a senior STEPEC major explained. "It is a work in progress you are constantly getting inspired by your fellow employees, you are constantly working on new projects."

The organization gives students a hands on approach to operating a business by setting up committees to better plan a variety of different aspects to make the company work better. Employees can become involved in the bookkeeping aspect of the business, with advertising or with countless other facets of the company. By working together the employees also develop a close working relationship.

"You really make good friendships working here," Hinson said. "We get a lot of support from the campus community and we get to learn a lot about what it is like to run a business."

Although working for Campus Design and Copy may not be the most relaxed job on campus it is a position that allows students to be part of very rewarding team.

"This is a job where you want to put pressure on yourself to succeed," Hinton said. "You want to leave something good behind when you graduate."

Office Employment

Offices across the campus call upon the student body to present their services to ensure an efficient and pleasant atmosphere in which to carry out their businesses. Wheatear one's interests lay in working a desk job, aiding in extensive public relations, or learning the keys to good organization, academic and administrative centers of UMass provide students with a wealth of job opportunities.

Pre-Major Advising Services in Goodell Hall offers students a chance at developing solid communication skills, as senior journalism major Greg Ng, who assists the office by filing papers, answering phone calls, and providing one on one student academic consultation, pointed out.

"Our main goal here is too make [school] less daunting [for students]," said Ng, "and that's one thing I've enjoyed helping out with."

He accredited recognizing the students who come into the advising office in need of courses and seeing them leave with what they want as his favorite perk about the job.

"For example," he proudly explained, "a student who hates math came in here with nine credits and a calculus course for his R2 [requirement]. He left with [a class in] logic and a course load of 15 credits and a smile on his face. That's the best part."

However, dealing with people on a day-to-day basis definitely has its ups and downs, according sophomore political science major Ariane Graham who is working for her second consecutive year at the Housing Assignments Office.

Graham's focus at the reception desk is to answer questions about campus housing that anyone, including students' parents, may have.

Her main goal is to help students get to where they want to live. However, she remarked how it is not always easy to do so, especially with an "overenrolled" university.

"The most memorable thing," she noted, "and usually the hardest, is dealing with the parents. For example, we sometimes get the parents of students who live in Sylvan coming in complaining that it's too far away [from the rest of the campus], even if the students don't have a big problem with living there."

Optimistically, Graham added that with a little time and reasoning, it is not too hard to make parents see the tight housing situation on campus and its limited resources to ensure everyone's satisfaction.

By student's own testimonies, developing such mediating skills is an essential key to working in an office environment and also one of the greatest rewards.

"Talking face to face with patrons has made me less shy," stated senior psychology major Nina Back, who checks books in and out at of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, shelves books upon their return to the building, and is always available for questioning.

In addition to dealing with patrons to their offices, student employees connect with fellow co-workers, thus creating a team-like environment.

"I like working here," Back asserted, "It seems like an easy job, and the people I work with make this really enjoyable."

Senior Allison Pusey, a double major in French and communications, understood Back's sentiment wholeheartedly.

"You can live in dorms on campus and everything, but the people that you work with are like a small family," stated Pusey, who has worked at the circulation desk at the Foreign Language Resource Center (FLRC) in the basement of Herter Hall for the past four years and was last year awarded for her excellence as an exceptional student employee.

Amongst her many responsibilities in the office, some of which include signing out videos from the FLRC library, answering students' questions, attending to the adjacent computer lab, and helping professors set up laser disk players for classes at the center, Pusey has kept in mind the importance of forming coalitions with her co-workers.

"I love the people I work with," she said, noting her appreciation in that her fellow employees understand all the things she may have to deal with on a daily basis and can relate easily since the majority of them are also UMass students.

Other Opportunities

There are a number of jobs that are available to students on campus that are often not even though of when one first thinks about possible employment. Some of these jobs allow workers to express their creative talents, some let students try their hand at managerial and leadership positions, others provide an opportunity for social interactions.

One job that boasts that students can do their homework while they work is student security. Pam Gills, a sophomore Psychology major and a student security receptionist explained that she worked during the evening making sure that the dormitories were secure. According to her, much of her job involved signing in students and getting their information.

"It has been pretty easy so far," she explained. "Everyone I work with seems really nice, a lot of people on my floor are receptionists so that helps."

In order to get her job Gills attended a group interview held by security that helped to explain what the organization, run through the UMass Police Department, did and what would be expected of her working there.

"You had to go to a mass interview and take a test," she explained. "The whole thing lasted about two hours."

Ever wanted to drive a bus? One business, the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) gives students with at least three remaining semesters the opportunity to drive around one of their busses. A popular job among students, driving the bus offers up the chance to meet a lot of new and interesting people. The company employs around 150 undergraduates at UMass each semester. Students are required to work 15 hours a week, but hours are flexible and the company works around student's class schedules.

Concerned because you don't have the license to drive a bus? That is not a problem at the company either they will train you. The job is also pretty lucrative offering up $7.50 an hour just to train you for your class B license and an $8.50 an hour starting wage plus room for raises.

Is working in something stationary more your speed? Perhaps the job that you are looking for is at the Campus Center Hotel. The hotel, located on the third floor of the Campus Center, is always looking for someone to clean rooms, answer phones, or man the front desk. According to Rachelle Allen, the allure of the job revolves around the customers.

"The best part of the job is being able to interact with the customers," Allen said. "You are able to meet people from all around the world."

The hotel handles a great deal of business from conferences put on by through the University and from travelers who have heard about the hotel's good reputation. Nedim Hasanovic an employee at the hotel, explained that the hotel provides good experience to anyone that is interested in going into a career in hotel and restaurant management or students that are interested in finding out what it is like to work in a hotel.

"Working here helps you to get your foot in the door at any hotel in the world," Hasanovic explained. "You get a hands on experience here."

The hotel is also has a very student friendly atmosphere that allows for both flexible hours and positive staff interactions.

"It is a relaxed atmosphere, and we like to keep it that way," Hasanovic said. "It is very flexible."

If you get a job at the information desk the pivotal role of your position is to communicate with people. According to Sue Praetz, a senior Psychology major and an employee at the desk the most interesting part of her job is working with the public. She explained that her job involved answering questions for parents, who call the University, to set up tours and more recently to direct lost students to their classrooms. When calls to the desk get slow Praetz has a little time to talk with friends, do some homework, or just people watch.

"I have the best job on campus," Praetz said.

The variety of available job opportunities on campus is indeed vast, and as such cannot all be described in this broad sampling. However, for those interested in finding a working environment with the best fit for them can search for employment in several different ways.

Information specifically centered on job opportunities provided by Auxiliary Services can be obtained in the Student Staff Development office (with its adjacent job board), located on the ninth floor of the Campus Center.

For other choices, students can read about the latest jobs on campus and in the surrounding Amherst/Northampton area by going to the Financial Aid web page (http://www.umass.edu/umfa) and clicking on the "Student Job Opportunities" link on the left hand side of the screen. Jobs found there include both work-study and non-work-study.

The same list is also provided on bulletin boards outside of the Student Employment Services office at 243 Whitmore. For questions, call 545-1530.

So whether it be a job typing and filing in an university office or working at the Blue Wall or in one of the wide variety of dining halls on campus, cleaning rooms in the hotel or signing people in for student security, there is a job out there on campus for you.

Flags fly high in town of Amherst

By Nathan Jones
Collegian Correspondent

Twenty-nine flags originally taken down to mixed feelings were returned, at half staff, as a result of the unprecedented events that, despite causing fear and destruction, also produced unprecedented national unity.

Veteran's agent Rod Raubeson had previously used money in his Town- Meeting-appropriated Commemorations budget to purchase 29 American Flags, which were flown from light-posts downtown starting August 11th. He proposed the flags come down after Labor Day, be put up again for Veterans Day, and be flown Memorial Day to July 4th and Labor Day to Veterans Day in the future.

The plan at the time they were originally put up, according to a statement released by the Select Board - with whom the decision of when to fly the flags rests - was to fly the flags for a trial period of three weeks, which was done.

Town Manager Barry Del Castilho then ordered the flags removed until a hearing could be held at the Select Board's September 10th meeting to determine the best times to fly the flags. However, as some opposition mounted to flying the flags at all, Castilho described in a recent statement how Raubeson opposed his order for the flag removal.

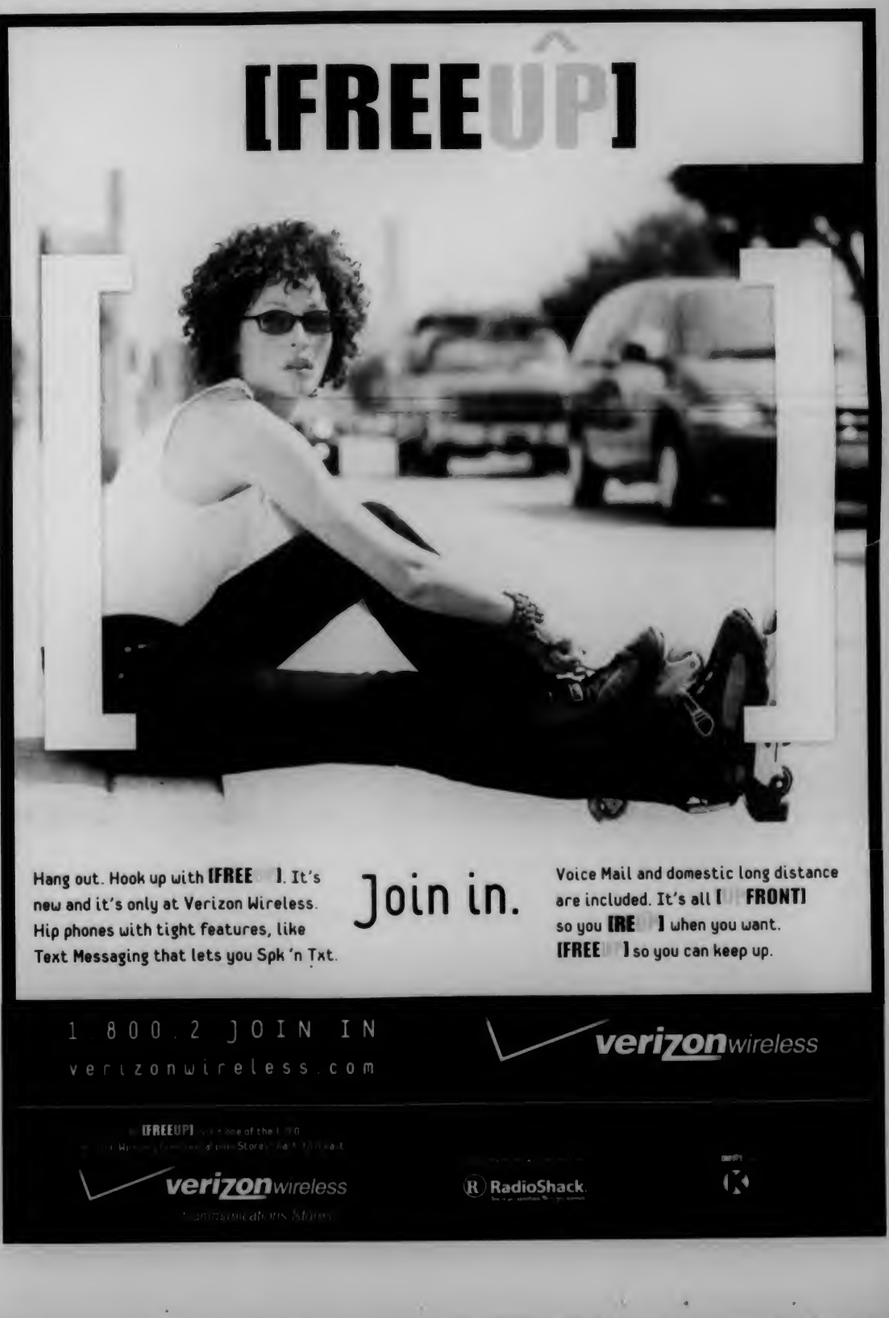
He refused to participate in the removal, which was executed by the Department of Public Works. "He felt that removing the flags amounted to capitulation to that opposition, so he didn't want to be involved in removing them and objected quite strongly to my decision to remove them," Castilho said. Raubeson could not be reached for comment.

The Select Board's statement alludes to having heard a "wide range of opinions," at the meeting, but the only meeting minutes available at press time recorded only the final decisions and not the discussion that preceded them. Castilho mentioned, however, that possibilities of displaying the flags from graduation weekend through July 4th, Martin Luther King Day, and Patriots Day had been discussed.

The final Select Board decision remains somewhat ambiguous, stating only that "the special flag display will be most appropriate and effective by being a commemoration of special holidays and occasions to add to the flags displayed year round by the Town."

Eight flags are visible from the center of town, three of which are permanent. These will continue to fly year-round, and the Select Board statement stressed that at no time was there discussion of removing them, nor is it the decision of the Board not to fly the remaining 29 flags.

The events of September 11th are the grim first "special occasion" which restored all 29 flags to their positions around town. The Select Board statement, calling the attacks a "tragically appropriate" time to bring them back, describes how citizens quickly retrieved and put up the flags, while Select Board Chair and veteran Carl Seppala personally helped lower them to half staff.



The flags were returned to full staff the morning of Sunday the 23rd in accordance with the Presidential Proclamation that governs all federal buildings. Castilho said they will continue to fly as dictated by the Congressional Resolution of September 13, which asks that citizens fly flags for 30 days. How long after that they will come down and return to the normal holiday-only schedule is anyone's guess, however. As Castilho said: "No one can predict what will happen, locally or nationally, by the end of that period."

We need Faith

Security a necessity

Massachusetts again saw its defenses weakened and sense of security put on hold yesterday, as two reports suggested that security at Logan airport is among the worst in the country, and that visible protection at the state's reservoirs has markedly increased.

Questions regarding the state's water supplies first came into question last Saturday, when the Quabbin reservoir was shut down indefinitely after two low-flying planes were spotted overhead. Some officials fear that, while improbable, any number or type of contaminates could be dropped into the water that supplies the majority of Eastern Massachusetts.

While most seem to think that a successful attack on our reservoirs is improbable, the suggestion of insufficient security at Logan, the 18th busiest airport in the country, has raised eyebrows, and for good reason.

According to reports in the Boston Globe yesterday, the Federal Aviation Administration released data from a decade-long report, noting that Logan was worst in the nation for failing to stopping guns and imitation bombs that had been carried through by federal agents. The report goes on to say that, from 1991 to 2000, some 234 guns were passed through airport security undetected.

The report comes with a heightened sense of interest in the wake of September 11, an event that has left us all looking for a way to feel – and become – more secure. While the report of slack security at Logan must be taken seriously, remember this: the planes hijacked out of Boston and ultimately flown into New York City were not victims of guns or bombs. Like everything else, our routines and preconceptions have been stripped away; what we're left defending against is something we may never be able to see.

The airports, however, are doing what they can to settle the growing public unease. They're promising tightened security, new restrictions and other measures that will take steps toward ensuring our safety. How legitimate those promises are, though, and how long they'll remain intact if they are in fact instated is the question. After all, it seems that the tightest security wouldn't have picked up on the items used to take down four planes on an early September morning.

What now, then? How much faith do we place in a system that has seemingly failed us on countless occasions before? As much as we can. Like everything else now, it's not a time to question and pick apart what can ultimately protect us. As much as the airlines need to step up and deliver to the absolute best of their ability, we need to believe that they can.

High School High:

Back to the basics

DAN LAMONTHE

Man, I'm getting old. I know things are changing when I go back to grade school and everyone thinks I'm a teacher.

Actually I suppose I kind of am. In the last two weeks I've been to my old high school (Chicopee Comprehensive) and to a middle school in East Longmeadow. Not that it's a big deal, people observe teaching all the time. We all remember sitting in class while the weird dude in the shirt and tie came in and sat in the back of our classrooms and took notes. Well, that weird dude is officially now me.

You know what? The weird dude feels weird when he takes a seat in a class to watch, too. Maybe because I went back to my high school for the first one, but it just felt plain ol' odd. The first class at Comp wasn't too bad because it was all underclassmen that wouldn't recognize me, but my second class was different. Play this one out in your head:

Dan walks into classroom in a shirt and tie. Dan hears, "CHH!! What are YOU doing here!!??"

There it is, strike one. How to know you're out of place rule number 22: people will call you by pet nicknames that you have not heard in well over a year. That's an ugly one, too.

Dan takes two steps into the classroom. Dan hears, "DUUUUDE!!! Are YOU are sub???"

Ouch. Kids that played JV basketball while I was on varsity probably never planned on seeing me in their classrooms, so I'm sure that they got a great big kick out of seeing me come back to their school and squirm in a chair while their English teacher, a teacher I've had, asks me what I've prepared for a lesson to teach the class. Newsflash: when someone is observing, they're not teaching the class, they're sitting and watching, and that's all.

My old teacher got a kick out of watching my face, I'm sure, because hell definitely would have frozen over before I was planning on teaching that day. No lesson plan equals Dan looking like an idiot in front of a class of high school kids. I just got done with looking like an idiot in front of high schoolers when I graduated two years ago. I've moved on to making myself look stupid in front of college classes now.

Last Friday, I made the second of many treks to an area school to observe. I ended up at Birchland Park, a classy little school in East Longmeadow. It's a techno kind-of-school, not quite what you'd expect from a middle school. What kind of middle school has its own TV station? I couldn't believe that one. They've got all these six graders running around like they're aides to Peter Jennings, and they know their stuff.

> "Face it, there just are not many college kids that want to hear how well Johnny Four-Eyes can spell and define a word like 'agorapho-bia.' It bores me to tears."

I felt much more teacher-like at Birchland Park, probably because I've got a like a foot on most of those little tykes in height. I'd forgotten something. Kids are mad dumb. Maybe I'm odd, but the first thing I think of when I see a six-foot tall guy in a shirt and tie come in isn't "Hey man, are you really in are class? How old are you?" It would be easy for me to blow the kid off as a trying to be funny, but I don't think he was. He was just that dumb Natural selection just didn't get the kid yet.

My day dragged on. Teaching's going to be fine if I decide to do it, but observing classes bores the ever-living snot out of me. Sitting through those classes was bad enough the first time five and ten years ago. Face it, there just are not many college kids that want to hear how well Johnny Four-Eyes can spell and define a word like 'agorapho-bia.' It bores me to tears. I know its something I have to do, though, so I guess I should keep quiet about it.

The highlight of my day was definitely people actually thinking I was a teacher. I actually stopped a fight in the halls just by wearing a shirt and tie! I'm walking down a hallway and I hear "Hey! Watch out! A teacher is coming." Some loud-mouthed little girl apparently thought it was important to let her friends know I was coming. As I get to the crowd, I see one kid up against the wall and one kid on the floor. Neither one is hurt or anything like that, but you can see the look of panic on their face when I get to them. Basically, the look is there because of what they think I am. There's no other reason, they (GASP) thought, I was a teacher. One of the kids was sitting on his butt on the floor, and all he can think to do is mumble "I fell."

"Yeah right, kid. I didn't fall off of the turnip truck yesterday," I wanted to laugh.

Instead, I play the tough guy, giving my best R.A. impression. "Scatter," I menace in a deep voice, just like that, the kids are – POOF – gone. I wanted to laugh with someone about it, I really did. Then I realized that I was in the hallway all by myself, because everyone else got the heck out of dodge because of the big, mean teacher (ME). It killed my joy. I felt like the abominable snowman or something.

All in all, I guess they weren't a bad few days. Take a few notes, answer a couple of stupid kiddy questions, and teacher observations are golden.

Turning the big 21 doesn't survive the hype

ROB SCHULTZ

I'm 21 now.

Woo.

Let me tell you how I spend my thrilling twenty-first birthday. Class from 9 to 11 in the morning. Waiting in line at the RMV in Hadley for the privilege of paying $53.75 for a paper license for a good while. Back to my apartment to make lunch. Doing laundry at the famed Sunderland Suds Laundromat. Going to work. Class from 6 to 8 at night. Back to work. Quick break to go to Rafters with some of my friends/coworkers where I have one pint of Sam Adams. Back to work. I leave work at 11. Go home because the class from 6 to 8 gave me a headache. Go to bed.

Woo.

Somehow, when I turned twenty I figured that my next birthday would be ultra exciting. I pictured bars, and women, and presents, and cookies. At the very least more than one beer. At the very, very least at least not doing my laundry for Chrissakes.

Oh well.

Things don't always work out the way we want them to. For instance, I thought that shaving my head and going bald would make me sleek and sexy. I never thought to heed Dave Barry's warning that hairless white guys look like thumbs, which is (as it turns out) the total truth. I also figured that painting dorm rooms as a summer job would be fun and carefree, and not the single most tedious task I've ever been burdened with in my life.

I'm not even going to get into the time when I was in middle school and let Matt Terazzi put me in the Sharpshooter.

Anticlimactic, or not, being 21 does have a good feel to it. I went into the liquor store by my apartment the other day and just kind of browsed. It was strange to actually get to be there and not feel guilty or afraid of getting caught. I didn't actually buy anything – it figures that the first booze emporium I enter as a legal adult doesn't have what I'm looking for. Still, it was a learning experience. I wasn't aware that there was cheaper whiskey out there than what I've been drinking. I'll have to downgrade.

It's just nice to be free from the daily worries that comes from being underaged around here. All the crap that surrounds some simple liquid is so amazingly stressful in these parts. When you live on campus Residence Life treats you like a criminal. 21 an adult, and Wee child if you get caught with even a drop of the stuff. The cops could send you to jail if they wanted to if you even had it on your breath. You can't even drive with a bottle in your car if you haven't passed the magic number. It's such a stupid bureaucracy from whose clutches I am finally free!

Mwahahahahahahahaha!

Other than that (and the ability to drink fifteen beers in the Grad Lounge before writing columns) not all that much has changed. I'm bound and determined not to become a booze hound like so many other before me who couldn't handle the responsibilities of being legal. I'm not going to abandon my younger friends to spend every night at the Hampshire Pub because that just sucks, and I'd just miss them. I'm not going to go broke, committing liver atrocities that I can't afford rent or food or Direct Satisfaction.

As far as my experience goes, the 21 is a-okay. I can give it a six out of ten. Not there for Friday because this Don't let it be on a Monday. Or a Tuesday. Or any other night that you have work and class and homework and early class the next day and when all your friends have the same problem.

Also, I'd recommend drinking before you venture anywhere near the sweet, sweet Registry of Motor Vehicles. It's not a bad scene.

In summary Woo

Questioning the future

Do we really want to move on?

It's less than two weeks until I take the LSAT, the Law School Admissions Test. Yes, Saturday, October 6th, I'll be venturing over to Amherst College at about 8:00a.m. to sit in a quiet, sterile room for about four and a half hours, and take an excruciating test that includes logic games, reading comp, and analytical reasoning.

I've been studying for the LSAT for about three months now. I started this summer when I was interning in Washington DC. I really didn't have much to do at my internship, so I just sat in the library and did problem sets. Now, after all of this preparation; all the books, all the practice tests, the Kaplan Online Crash Course and the time and effort put toward a decent score, it's all about to come together and all I have to say about it is, what am I doing?

In addition to the countless hours of studying for the LSAT, I've also been requesting law school applications from a bunch of schools all over the country. I've ordered the Law School Data Assembly Service Registration Booklet, I'm calling up professors and asking them to write recommendations for me. I'm doing all of this in order to apply, be admitted, and then go to some law school next fall. I'm going through the motions of really wanting to go to law school, and acting like I'm confident that that's the path I want my life to follow.

But in reality, it's just a front. I have to be honest. People ask me, "why do you want to go to law school," and "so you want to be a lawyer, huh?" And I always come up with some clever answer that sounds somewhat educated and secure. But the truth is, I'm totally scared of graduating and leaving school, getting a job, and growing up. So I decided that going to more school was the obvious solution to my dilemma.

Graduation from college seems so far away when you're filling out college applications. And then you get to college and you're worried about finding classes, finishing your major, and getting in all those pesky Gen Eds. But then one day, you look at your degree audit and you realize that come May (or December, or whenever you finish), you're homeless. College is so cushy compared to the life outside. And again, to be honest, I'm not looking forward to packing up my apartment and moving on. I don't want to work all day, I don't want to go out looking for a job or worrying about paying back school loans or health insurance. So instead of facing this overwhelming challenge, I decided to take the coward's way out and become a professional student.

CATHERINE TURNER

Law school doesn't seem like that bad of an idea, really. I mean, I'll be in an academic setting, going to classes and meeting people, doing homework and such. Life won't fundamentally be that much different than undergrad, right? Granted I'll be extra busy and it's super-intense and everything, but it's worth it in the end, right? Because after suffering through three years of the Socratic Method and legal briefs, I'll have a job waiting for me! This is what I keep telling myself, and the more I tell myself about the joys of a law education, the easier it becomes to study problem sets and pay the $95 to subscribe to the Law School Admissions Council.

Please don't send this piece to my mother. Because she's of the idea that you shouldn't go to law school unless you're completely sure that you want to be a lawyer, and if she learned of my insecurity and cowardice, she'd probably be quite upset. I'd get a phone call warning me of the dangers of unhappiness in school; she'd tell me that it's not worth taking out the loans and spending all that money if you're not totally excited about being a lawyer for your life. And then I'd have to reassure her that I'm confident in my choice, yadda yadda yadda, and lie to her just like I'm lying to everyone else. I'd have to say, "Mom, I don't know where you're getting this idea that I'm not excited about law school. I've wanted to be a lawyer all my life!"

Do I really want to go to law school? Am I just having eleventh hour jitters? Well, I look at it this way: I like school. I'm good at it. Law fascinates me. I think a law education would be interesting, challenging and fulfilling. And yes, when I get out, I'll have something waiting for me, hopefully not just angry loan officers. I think I'd be a pretty good lawyer. Besides, you can do a lot with a law degree, not just become a lawyer, right? I could go into politics; I could be a VP of a highly lucrative financial endeavor. I could develop real estate. I can sell my soul for money. Or I could help people. The world would really be my oyster with a law degree. I think I'm making the right decision: I've made the decision to put off making serious decisions for another couple of years, and that's what I'm most confident about. Who wants to grow up, really?

So now all I have to do is get a good score on the LSAT. I have few short days to polish my reasoning skills before I have to prove myself. Standardized tests are terrible anyway, how can one test quantify intelligence and qualifications? For now I'm not too worried about it. I think I'll do okay. I'm not worried about October 6th, it's the rest of my life that makes me anxious.

Fall Music

All tangled up in blue

By Ben Beals

Not too long ago I didn't know much about Bob Dylan but after a little bit of research and I've come to a conclusion. Singer of American folk music, man who [illegible], the paternalistic [illegible] influencing [illegible] of listeners, but also [illegible] musicians, [illegible] to be one of the [illegible] American heroes of the [illegible].

Bob Dylan has been [illegible] sixty years, and [illegible] certain [illegible] albums are [illegible] various songs and [illegible] they illustrate the [illegible] he's [illegible], and show the [illegible] originality [illegible] his music. This [illegible] long, writer [illegible] and has [illegible] person who [illegible] a shift for, because [illegible] does everything. That [illegible] Bob Dylan can do whatever he pleases as a musician [illegible] he was the best [illegible] with the pen, [illegible] if [illegible] damn album [illegible] [illegible] going to do.

That being said, Dylan's [illegible] showcases Dylan [illegible] square in the middle. The album is a romp through [illegible] that be Dylan's roots, and [illegible] crafted album [illegible] united. Blues is the name of the game, and Dylan [illegible] after song, each with a different texture, bouncing from straight up 12-bar-blues, to klesmer-esque song and dance in the song "Floater (Too Much to Ask)," to slide guitar, to something almost resembling swing, and then back again. Love and Theft seems almost schizophrenic in its personalities at first listen, but after a closer look, it pulls you in.

Lyrics on Love and Theft take the same road that Hard to Explain musical style and texture do. You can't tell whether Dylan is chucking his lyrics around carelessly or if he's grown ever more controlled and meticulous. In the song "Summer Days," for example, Dylan jumbles word upon word in a swinging jaunt, "Lookin' into my eyes she's holdin' my hand/ Looked into my eyes she's a-holdin' my hand/ She said, 'You can't repeat the past'/ I said 'You can, what do you mean you can't, of course you can." While not quite poetic as in days of yore, the lyrics in most of his songs are a confirmation that Bob Dylan has had the potential all along to be a song and dance man (look back to Nashville Skyline), and not just a wandering minstrel that he's so often recognized as.

All in all its quite a trip that Dylan takes us on, an acknowledgement that he's been around the block a dozen times or so, and that he's seen and done it all. Love and Theft is his attempt at humoring himself, crossing boundaries that wouldn't have been crossed by a younger Bob Dylan, but have been hurdled now (and quite deftly), by a wizened old man.

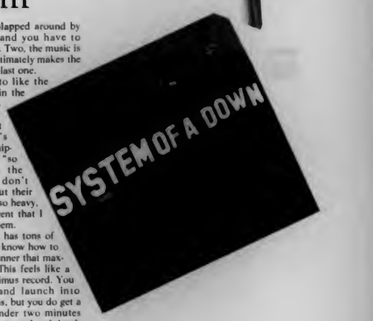
THE STROKES
Is This It
RCA

The best way to approach The Strokes is such: forget the hype, listen to the album. If you have the pleasure of not being caught up in the music journalism hypestorm surrounding the New York City based band (the cover of The Fader, NME raves, Kerrang! could care less), just let the music speak for itself, which it does, loudly.

I confess to being none too naive to the buzz, having bought The Modern Age EP earlier this summer after hearing all sorts of otherworldly praise. I've also been able to listen to the songs from Is This It in a variety of contexts, from wearing out the EP to downloading the "Hard to Explain" single to finally receiving the album (with the aborted naughty cover) and hearing the final revamped versions. But having listened to the music before and after reading a variety of fawning, hating, and indifferent articles, I can't look at the album as anything but a collection of eleven amazing songs, probably the most consistent and satisfying record of the year. I'll leave the Velvet Underground comparisons, retro resurgence musings and garage rock talk to reviewers with more time on their hands. I'm busy listening to the album for the millionth time.



Is This It, every spin, carries the burden of hype with an effortless swagger. The album's not trying to be anything important, say anything important, or be a massive revolution in music. That's the job of rabid critics, to inflate the importance of albums like this so ten years from now we can talk about how Is This It, like Nevermind, changed the world forever. But then something like the tragedy of September 11 comes along

Shock to the System

SYSTEM OF A DOWN
Toxicity
American

After hearing "Prison Song" for the first time, I wasn't sure I was going to like SOAD's new, more politically oriented stance. I mean, they were certainly political on parts of the first album, like on "War?" and "P.L.U.C.K.," the second a song about the history of their native Armenia. But nothing was as blunt as "Prison Song," which contains absolutely no subtlety, and even features Serj Tankian yelling (in drill sergeant fashion) facts (but very few ideas) about the U.S. prison system.

But it eventually grew on me, for a couple of reasons. One, the song makes absolutely no attempt to cater to any kind of audience. Crazy lefties will no doubt find the politics half-assed (they are), it's righty repellent, and the song's jagged structure and wild shifts are about as far from the radio-friendly mainstream you can get. So System is obviously doing things they way they want to, not being slapped around by outside interests, and you have to admire them for that. Two, the music is great. This is what ultimately makes the album great, like the last one.

True, you have to like the band's crazy antics in the first place. Serj's humorous demonic growls, guitarist Daron Malakian's high-pitched vocal snippets, silly lines like "so you want to see the show./ you really don't have to be a ho." But their sound is so eclectic, so heavy, so melodic, so different that I can't help but love them.

Musically, SOAD has tons of good ideas, and they know how to present them in a manner that maximizes their effect. This feels like a punk version of a Primus record. You won't hear the band launch into extended jam sessions, but you do get a handful of songs under two minutes that sound every bit as good and developed as the longer ones. It all hits you

JAY-Z
The Blueprint
Roc-A Fella Records

Fitting with the title of his latest album, Jay-Z's career has been a blueprint for rap success. Being able to successfully mix super infectious samples with tight rhymes, and striking a balance between street credibility and mainstream popularity has put Jay-Z at or near the top of the rap game for the past five years.

Jay-Z's sixth studio album, The Blueprint, is not markedly different from his previous efforts. Jay-Z is and always has been a blueprint for where hip-hop is at the times his albums drop. In many ways he personifies everything about hip hop music. Songs about money, sex, blunts, bling, haters and sometimes violence certainly is nothing new. Sure, there are countless rappers with the same shtick, but none of them pull it off like Jigga. Jay-Z has always had just enough creative flair to keep the flows fresh. Mainly this comes from creative sampling and some of the best rap production in the game.

While Jay-Z's sound is heavily reliant on sampling, its not as if the beats make up for a lack of flow. He's no Dead Prez, but on most tracks he actually has something to say. Just two tracks into the album Jay-Z continues with the long-standing hip-hop tradition of lyrically ripping up enemies, or "haters," on "Takeover." The target this time: Nas and Mobb Deep. tributions (although minimal) to the music landscape. Throughout the early '90s Carey produced one hit song after another mainly in the pop and R&B vein. But in 1995, as the hip-hop revolution was overtaking MTV, she incorporated the style into her own music. Her first collaboration with the Wu-Tang Clan's Old Dirty Bastard not only marked a change in Carey's musical direction but also a milestone in hip-hop and pop.

But instead of raising the bar and delving into a new art form, Carey continues to play it safe and rides the same wave of urban-oriented songs. It was fun in the mid-90s, but now it sounds like played-out rubbish. By doing this, she treats her own self as a washed up has-been who has little to no bearing in the pop world.

Released in conjunction with her 80s-reminiscent motion picture debut of the same name, Glitter (also doubling as a solo album) features 12 newly recorded tracks and a plethora of contribution with such well-known producers as Jimmy Jam & Terry Lewis, DJ Clark, DJ Clue, Damizza as well as vocal contributors.

The album begins and ends with the dreadful "Loverboy." Even the remix version featuring Da Brat, Ludacris, Twenty II, and Shawna can't save this pitiful song. Overemoted ballads are abundant. "Lead the Way" and the just-released "Never Too Far" exemplify Carey's multi-octave vocals but meander in nothingness land.

"If We" exemplifies what's wrong with Carey's current obsession of melding hip-hop with her powerful vocals. On such tracks, she's reduced to cooing maniacally in the background while rappers like Ja Rule and Mystikal control nearly the entire song. Carey's position has little to no coherency on these tracks.

Carey sounds most at ease on "All My Life" as she laughs in the middle of the drum 'n' bass-driven single, a decent collaboration with Rick James. But it's on tracks like "I Didn't Mean to Turn You On" and "Last Night a DJ Saved My Life" that Glitter truly sparkles (funny how both are remakes). On the latter, Carey enlists Busta Rhymes and Fabolous who cut up on the mike, as the diva comes in to deliver the payoff line, "There's not a problem that I can't fix/ Cause I can do it in the mix."

Hints of what caused Carey's emotional and physical exhaustion are far and few between on Glitter. A source of controversy since her entrance into a rehab center is Sony president and ex-hubby Tommy Mottola, whom she believes is preventing her from having any future success. "Don't you even care/ Just the slightest bit for me" the songbird chirps on "Reflections (Care Enough)."

Other clues are just as sketchy. "Feelin' kinda fragile and I've got a lot to handle/ But I guess this is my way of saying goodbye," Carey exhales on "Twister." Even though the tune can be directly applied to Carey's current situation, her handlers maintain the song was written about the recent suicide of her stylist.

You would think that after her new record label forked over $23.5 million Carey would be able to produce an artistically mature album. Instead, we're subjected to the same emptiness of all her previous material.

Carey must immediately begin to assess her career. She received sympathy from the public after admitting herself in a rehab center for "extreme exhaustion." Her relapse, however, drew jeers and has continued to question her relevance to the entertainment world. Glitter bowed at a disappointing no. 7 on the Billboard Album chart. And the reaction to Glitter, the movie, was embarrassing entering at no. 11 raking in a paltry $2.5 million.

Carey should stick to a singer/songwriter career. Most people automatically associate her as a singer. Audiences can barely stomach her incessant giggles and non-stop gibberish in interviews let alone on the big screen. Carey also needs to transcend the hip-hop influence she popularized and move on. It's the highly stylized dramatic pop ballads, along with her knock 'em out vocals, where she truly shines. Simply put, Glitter isn't gold.

started, but now he's just garbage," and tells Nas and his Oochie Wally crew not to talk trash about him, or as Jay puts it, "not to throw rocks at the throne."

Still, throwing all the analysis and Rolling Stone music review hyperbole out the window, The Blueprint succeeds mainly for one reason: it has some really cool sounding beats and samples. Several of the tracks have an almost retro feel to them, with samples that run the gamut from The Doors to The Jackson 5. From hits like "The City is Mine," to "Hard Knock Life," to "I'll Do Anything," The Blueprint continues the Jay-Z tradition of thick sampling.

After "thanking everybody out there for their purchase," the album opening "The Ruler's Back" features trumpets of all things for a background beat. The creativity is appreciated, as is the shout out to Cleo The Psychic, where Jigga says, "he can predict the future like Cleo The Psychic." Of course the future he sees is one where he is king of the rap world. Following that, the haters anthem "Takeover" features The Doors sample from their song "Five To One."

"Izzo (H.O.V.A.)", the album's ultra-catchy first single follows, and is inexplicably irresistible. Inexplicable since most will have no idea what Jay is talking about (apparently the hook has something to his nickname "Hova," but hey, this is The Collegian not The Source, I don't know everything). Irresistible since the song is an indispensable club anthem. Wait, I promised no Rolling Stone music review lines. In reality, the track is the catchiest thing on the album, and might rival "Hard Knock Life" as Jay-Z's biggest hit yet.

The honor of being the second catchiest thing on the album goes to "Girls, Girls, Girls." While it's not exactly female empowering, it does provide some tight rhymes and beats. Michael Jackson of all people was supposed to provide background vocals for the track, but apparently it fell through, and the King of Pop stayed in Neverland instead of the hitting the hood. As a result, the unlikely trio of Q-Tip, Slick Rick, and Biz Markie provide background vocals.

Contrary to many hip-hop albums, the rest of The Blueprint is anything thing but filler. The Track Masters' joint, "Jigga That Nia" is a jumpy R&B flavored number that keeps the album flowing. The Timbaland-produced "Hola Hovita" provides a taste of some of the eccentric sampling that Timbo has become famous for. "Song Cry" is a rare hip-hop breakup song. "Renegade," which was co-written, produced by, and features Eminem, brings together two of hip-hop's biggest names of the past few years. The two lyrically bond over their common enemies: the haters, of course. For a duet of such superstar magnitude, it's a bit disappointing, but still a decent track.

On Blueprint, Jay-Z states, "If I ain't better than B.I.G., then I'm the closest one." While some might say that is a stretch, Jay-Z is one of the most successful rappers ever. Some go so far as to call him the best M.C. in the game today. The Blueprint shows that while Jay-Z is not yet in the league of Biggie (or Tupac for that matter), he is certainly among the best on the current scene.

But the music never loses its importance. It stays static, an unchanging document of one beautiful burst of creativity, free from the shitstorm that surrounds it. Is This It is a perfect snapshot of bristling energy and clear thinking. Every aspect of it feels perfectly planned and carefully executed, but not cold or overproduced. And it always sounds, like all good rock records, like a bunch of guys having a damn good time fooling around in the studio at our lucky expense.

The Strokes manage to walk the fine line between agonizing 'ain't we cool' detached posturing (cough B.R.M.C.), agonizing personal diatribes about their pain and relationships, and agonizing 'we're rawkers!' parades of half-assed riffs and odes about booze and cars. Instead, they take a little bit of each (all of which are lethal in large doses) and focus mainly on writing great songs that don't inspire spelunking for their greater importance. Their hip factor stems mostly from singer Julian Casablancas' mostly uneager-to-please delivery and humorous correction of a grunt he coughs up at the beginning of "New York City Cops." That song's chorus ("New York City cops/ they ain't that smart") feels inappropriate now, but the song's playful spirit permeates the entire album, whether wondering about girls or remembering life's little pleasures.

The joyful energy is, of course, most present in the music itself. I just hoped for a less stubbornly simplistic approach.

But on "Deer Dance," as on "Prison Song," the music is so vibrant and forceful that you can't let minor lyrical qualms stand in the way of enjoyment. In fact, the first five songs fire by at such a machine gun pace that there's no flabby time to contemplate any shortcomings. The structure of the album is perfect. "Needles" follows the seriousness of "Prison Song" with a jovial sing-a-long chorus, and the disc bounces right along until the excellent "Chop Suey!" combines the best of SOAD's manic heaviness (seen later on "Bounce" and "Shimmy") and their beautiful ballads (as on "Toxicity" and "Aerials").

System of a Down's slow and steady ascension to national prominence has given them a substantial soapbox to stand upon. Toxicity is a noble and consistent, if imperfect, offering that hardly sees the group in a state of exhaustion, but instead more than ready to attack a bright future.

so fast that you can't wait to spin it again just to absorb everything you missed.

The lame politics strike back on "Deer Dance," a song about the WTO riots. I'm no Poli-Sci major, but I'm sure that "pushing little children,/ with their fully automatics,/ they like to push the weak around," isn't the most brilliant or well-reasoned account of that event. Certainly, I'm all for the issues System brings up being discussed since they're important and everyone needs to be aware of them, but

New TV season not lacking in crap: Tube Notes gives the lowdown

It's that time of year again. Time for a new television season from the broadcast networks. Time for a bunch of crappy new shows that will be canceled after six episodes. And most of all, time for more of the same old same old: sitcoms written by "the people that brought you Friends" and reality shows.

Well, here it is: a rundown of some the new programs headed to a TV set near you this season. While it's true that I haven't seen any of these shows yet, I trust my intuition enough to let you the reader know what will be good, what will be bad, what will succeed and what will fail.

The Good (sort of)

Undeclared (Fox: Tuesdays 8:30 p.m.) From the people that brought us the entertaining but lowly rated NBC series "Freaks and Geeks" comes this new show that is described as "Freaks and Geeks" go to college. At least the series is realistic: college life filled with booze, sex, and parties.

Outlook: Could be entertaining, and at least NBC didn't give it the Saturday night "death" time slot that "Freaks and Geeks" got.

The Bernie Mac Show (Fox: Wednesdays 9:30 p.m.) The King of Comedy Bernie Mac plays himself as an accidental father inheriting three children from his drug addicted sister.

Outlook: Mac's standup routine is usually hilarious, with solid writing it should translate onto the small screen well.

24 (Fox: Tuesdays 9 p.m.): Kiefer Sunderland stars as a bodyguard for a US Senator in this new drama which takes the unique form of telling its story in 24 episodes, with each episode representing one of 24 hours in one day. The show supposedly takes place in real time, so when the audience is at commercial, action supposedly still takes place (translation: Sunderland takes a leak during commercials).

Outlook: Show gets points right off the bat for its creativity. As long as it isn't TV movie-like cheesy, it could be the season's best new show.

The OK

The Agency (CBS: Thursdays 10 p.m.) As a CIA-themed drama, it's not particularly creative, but early reviews have been positive.

Outlook: These types of dramas a rarely bad, but often mediocre.

Could go either way.

Law and Order: Criminal Intent (NBC: Sundays 9 p.m.) A "Law and Order" spin off starring Vincent D'Onofrio who chases after those damn bad guys.

Outlook: If it's anything like "Law And Order," it certainly should be.

Scrubs (NBC: Monday 8:30 p.m.) ER only funnier, supposedly.

Outlook: Another hospital show...yawn.

The Ellen Show (CBS: Friday 8 p.m.) A forty something professor (Ellen Degeneres) moves home to a small town.

Outlook: Ellen can be funny if that's your flavor. The Friday night slot might be the kiss of death for it. Then again, it's not as if Ellen fans are big Friday night party animals anyway.

Maybe It's Me (WB: Friday 8:30 p.m.) A teenager comes to realize just how lame her family is in this comedy. Most notably, the series will use a "Pop Up Video" style of constant commentary.

Outlook: The pop up format could be entertaining, but it could also be annoying. I'll bet the latter.

Smallsville (WB: Tuesday 9 p.m.) Hot teens and the WB; a winning formula. Actually this show chronicles the teenage years of Clark Kent. That's right, Superman.

Outlook: Another intriguing concept. Could it be that the networks are actually getting more creative?

Off Center (WB, Sundays, 9:30 p.m.) The writers of American Pie bring us a comedy that includes a white rapper named Status Quo. Supposedly, this will basically be "The Man Show" in sitcom format.

Outlook: It will be full of sleazy and crude humor, but on broadcast television that isn't saying much.

The Bad and The Ugly

Inside Schwartz (NBC: Thursdays: 8:30 p.m.) An aspiring sportscaster (Breckin Meyer of Road Trip fame) has a referee follow him around constantly and make calls. For instance, when he's a on a date ready to get some first base action, the ref calls Meyer for "illegal use of tongue."

Outlook: I have to go off on this one. First of all, how many shows has NBC put in Thursday night 8:30 time slot that have failed over the years? Of all the ways NBC could enlighten the world in the coveted time slot between "Friends" and "Frasier," with a huge lead-in audience, they give us this crap. A ref following a guy around 24/7? Who's idea was that? And why do they have a job in television? More importantly, why do NBC executives making millions of dollars a year think that this show is a good idea, when a measly television writer for a college newspaper can clearly see that it is a pitiful, lust run a damn test pattern at 8:30. NBC, you'll probably get the same audience, and spare the world from another dud of a show.

Emeril (NBC: Mondays: 8 p.m.) The Iron Chef himself stars himself in this "comedy" which has gotten sour reviews from critics.

Bob Patterson: (ABC: Tuesday: 9 p.m.) Jason Alexander stars in this comedy, which has already been retooled after an awful pilot episode (bad sign).

Outlook: no show has ever been a success after a disastrous pilot episode in television history, and it won't start now.

The fat guy brings funktatude

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

Who's the Fat Guy?, a funk based trio based in Boston, performed at the Amherst Brewing Company last Thursday, September 21 to a packed house. I was accompanied by former Collegian boy band expert and current Tube Notes writer Kurt Polesky, who when we sat down ordered a Long Island Iced Tea (I guess he had a tough day) who says "Long Island iced teas enhance Who's the Fat Guy, but you don't need a Long Island iced tea to enjoy them." Who's the Fat Guy?, brings so much energy to the stage you want to dance along with them.

Keyboard player and lead vocalist, Mark Ross tickles the ivories with immense liveliness, it makes one wonder if he has springs in his pants. Kurtis Shakemore (who donned a Twizzlers t-shirt), bass guitarist and vocals, also adds to the high-energy atmosphere. I know you're thinking, "So what's so special about these guys?" Well I'll tell you. Not only does drummer Bradlee Cumberbatch play percussion drums, he also plays kegs! Yes, kegs! To quote an evil, evil doctor, "It's quite breath-taking really."

Their style is best summed up on their web site www-whosthefatguy.com, "a funk based trio which pushes the limits of modern pop with addictive melodies, deep-rooted rhythms and widespread harmonics. Each member draws to the table a variety of old skool influences. WTFG? is a band kept modern by its ability to create original, aggressive, fun-loving tunes."

And it was obvious the crowd really enjoyed the band; there were people dancing, flopping and jumping around everywhere to such songs as "Someone Stole My Bike" and "Disco Lullaby." The band already has a large following in the Amherst area; you could hear fans singing along with Ross and Shakemore, although they did not sound as good.

The band, along with the fans and Kurt Polesky, enjoyed the finest the Amherst Brewing Company has to offer.

Ross invited a friend from the area go up and jam with the band that seemed like it took forever. The crowd was bored and mulling around while the only people who seemed to be enjoying themselves was the band.

The band possesses a funky attitude I would like to call "funktatude" (a word I made up just to describe them).

It's all true. But I suppose the best way to describe them would be to call them a funky Ben Folds Five. They play kegs and wear Twizzlers t-shirts!

Who's the Fat Guy? will be performing at the ABC again November 1, 2001 at 10pm, but if you want to check them out before they make there way back to the Valley, just visit their web site for concert information.

Sittin' on the Dock o' the Bay
Kahoots plays The Bay State on September 28.

There will be a meeting tonight for anyone interested in writing for Arts. The meeting takes place at 6 p.m. in the Collegian offices in the Campus Center Basement.

At the 5:28 mark, Heather Hussey took a pass from Shelley Maasdorp and was able to shoot the ball by UMass keeper Ashley Egland. This gave the Crimson the lead going into the break and helped turn the momentum of the game.

Only a few minutes into the second frame, Maasdorp decided to do it herself, and tallied an unassisted goal to make the score 3-1. Less than 10 minutes later, Eliza Dick extended the lead once again with a score of her own, and at the 14:43 mark, the scoreboard read 4-1 Harvard.

The Minutewomen were able to make the contest a little more respectable when Heather Kenney, a freshman from Whitehouse Station, NJ, put home a rebound of a Bruemmer penalty corner miss with 7:48 left for her first collegiate goal, but it would not be enough. UMass would fail to make a serious run over the last eight minutes, and the Crimson cruised to their fourth win of the year.

"There was a lot of pressure falling behind," Bruemmer said. "We came back a little, though, and in the last 10 minutes we pressured them pretty well. Maybe we should have done that the whole game."

For the Maroon and White, goalie Egland was able to make three saves in the losing effort, while Harvard netkeeper Katie Zacarian tallied a mere two saves. This was a far cry from last season's contest, when she was challenged throughout the game by UMass and came up with a heroic effort, stopping a school record 19 shots, in addition to holding the opposition scoreless for 94 minutes.

This upcoming Saturday, the Minutewomen will try and right the ship when they travel to Storrs, CT to take on rival UConn. Game time is 1 p.m.

"We don't have anything to lose and we are not worrying about our record," Bruemmer said. "Last year we beat them so we are excited to play them again, and by that time everyone will have forgotten about [yesterday's] loss. We still have plenty of time to be successful."

Marquee matchups and not-so-NFL quarterbacks

The National Football League finally completed its second week of games this past weekend. The completion of those match-ups has set up week three for the match-up of the season, the one game all football fans have pointed to from the start of the year: 2-0 Cincinnati at 2-0 San Diego?

Like I said in the NFL preview article, I will not predict what the hell will happen in the NFL this season because quite frankly, the only person that knows what will happen this year is Miss Cleo. But with all that smoke behind her in those commercials she could not of even seen this. The Bengals didn't record their second win until October 29 last season and the Chargers didn't record their second win until, well, never.

The difference for these two teams this year has been at the quarterback position. That is something expected from the Chargers with the addition of Doug Flutie from Buffalo, but nobody expected the consistent QB play for the Bengals from that all-time great Jon Kitna.

Though his 358 yards passing in two games won't take your breath away, his zero interceptions won't give games away to the opposition. And his talk of making the playoffs when he first was signed in Cincy is rubbing off on his team, especially Takeo Spikes and the Bengal's defense, who single-handedly won the game on Sunday against Baltimore by forcing six turnovers.

Speaking of quarterback play, some 0-2 teams have some major problems at that position.

The Patriots will be without Drew Bledsoe for at least two weeks after losing two pints of blood following a hit by the Mo Lewis during the Jets 10-3 win. Bledsoe took that hit, got up and played the next series before finally being taken out of the game. I have always said that Bledsoe is not the smartest QB in the game, but I have never questioned that he is tough. However, that play could have been a lot worse than it actually was, so Drew, next time do a Rickey Henderson and slide.

The Seahawks are off to a great start. That is, it is a great start for whoever is playing Seattle that week. Matt Hasselbeck went from back up in Green Bay, to starter in Seattle and is well on his way to the bench. During most of his 9-of-24, 62-yard performance against Philadelphia, the crowd booed and chanted "Differ-Differ-Differ," for back up and Super Bowl champion Trent Differ. What has this world come to that fans are now cheering for Differ to be in the game. Another 0-2 team is the Washington Redskins.

However, unlike the other teams at 0-2 with QB problems, they just got rid of theirs. Jeff George, QB and the holder of the title, "Most likely to put his foot in his mouth for every coach he plays for," was released yesterday. For any team, you don't like to see your offense score the same number of points in two games as the number on the back of your quarterback's jersey. That problem is compounded when the QB's number is 3.

Jeff George was the reason why Norv Turner got fired, because Daniel Snyder wanted him to play over Brad Johnson. However, because Turner put in the OB who was better equipped to win, he lost his job. Snyder has now learned what every other team that George has played for has found out sooner or later: You can lose with him, you can lose without him, but at least there is a lot less stupidity coming out of the locker room.

Now that I am done wasting my time with Jeff George, let's go to a couple of marquee match-ups for week 3. There are two classic cases of high-octane offenses against shut yo mouth defenses. One happens in Missouri where the Rams take on the Dolphins. Jay Fiedler's dive on Sunday gave Miami a last gasp win over Oakland. He scored both touchdowns for the Fins, but they are going to need more than two Jay Fiedler runs this week. The Dolphins blitz will work against them this week as Kurt Warner and the Rams offense will be able to move the ball on Sunday. Giving six points at home, I'll take my chances on St. Louis.

Another match-up pits Denver and its all out attack against the Ravens destructive defense. Mike Shanahan said before the season that his team could score 30 points against anybody. Memo to Shanahan: let's see your offense do it against a defense that held your team to three points in the playoffs last season. Trust me, Denver will not score 30 this week, but they do not have to. No running game for the Ravens has meant the lack of a stable, mistake free offense that went together well with that stingy defense in 2000. Giving four points at Mile High, I like Denver.

cially you can't afford to play more than one sport," Bruemmer said.

Gilbert, on the other hand, was a multi-sport star who also turned heads on the softball diamond, the soccer pitch, the track and one other unlikely place – the ice hockey rink. Once recruiters began sniffing around the Loomis Chaffee School, one in particular saw Gilbert as a physical powerhouse who had honed invaluable skills on the boxed pond.

"As an ice hockey player, Ashley developed great foot speed and agility for someone of her size," Shea said. "That sort of athleticism is the first thing you look for in a recruit. Once you have that, field hockey skills can be taught."

Much of that teaching would come by example, as the Maine native arrived at UMass and immediately noticed a certain towering back with keen field vision and a rocket stroke. Bruemmer had anchored the team's penalty corner unit since her own arrival in 1998, when she had promptly wrapped up both the team and league scoring titles. As another tall power hitter with a knack for penalty corner heroics, Gilbert had found a role model.

"As soon as I came here, A-Bombs was the first person I looked up to," Gilbert said. "I immediately thought that she was someone whose shoes I would like to fill someday."

Those shoes were probably just as happy with the situation, as Gilbert's emergence loosened the defensive shackles that Bruemmer had endured as the team's single penalty corner threat. With two-thirds of last year's PC unit lost to graduation, Shea implemented a wealth of changes to the team's corner strategies that included using Gilbert as a second hitter and decoy on delays.

Suddenly, opposing teams began seeing double when the UMass penalty corner crew opened fire.

"These days, one option on corners isn't enough," Bruemmer said. "Teams know what we're going to do, so they can practice and prepare for it. With Ash as a second hitter, we can surprise teams that don't know who to focus on."

The Maroon and White twin peaks have not gone unnoticed by the Atlantic 10, either. When it came time to hand out its weekly Player and Rookie of the Week awards Monday, the league chose Bruemmer and Gilbert respectively. The former had exploded for a hat trick in Saturday's win over Indiana, a game in which the latter had opened scoring with her first-ever collegiate goal.

"It was a relief to get the first one, but hopefully it's one down, many more to come," said Gilbert of her unassisted score. "But getting the award was a total surprise. I didn't even know they had an award for rookies."

Bruemmer sees the twin accolades as a wake-up call for the conference's defensive players who may still believe the Maroon and White offense is a one trick pony.

"We haven't even started A-10 competition yet, and already we've got two players on the same team being recognized for their skills," said the senior. "That is a good sign for what we can do once we really come together."

With a sixth-straight A-10 title in their sights and three tough road dates at UConn, Boston University and Syracuse before them, the Minutewomen need a balanced offensive attack more than ever. Luckily, they have a powerful veteran scoring machine running at full throttle and an equally formidable freshman waiting in the wings for a chance to step up.

And in a sport ruled both literally and figuratively by goals, this is one instance where youth is hoping that experience is served.

"I'd like to see us as a team be as successful as Anke has been as an individual," Gilbert said.

Money for the best cause

By Maribel Morey
The Observer (U. Notre Dame)

(U-WIRE) SOUTH BEND, Ind.— The 80,795 fans in the Stadium on Saturday for the Notre Dame-Michigan State game raised $270,981 for the families of the firefighters and policemen who passed away after the World Trade Center's terrorist attacks.

Blue recycling bins substituted as collection baskets and fans turned their attention from the first quarter score to their own wallets.

"People definitely wanted to help out and when the opportunity presented itself, they really came through," said Jonathan Jorissen, chief of staff for the office of the president.

With more than 80,000 people in one area, Jorissen believed the potential to raise this amount of money would be great. Once the student volunteers collected bags of money after the first quarter, a group of 20 students remained sorting the money for the rest of the game.

"We sorted it in like piles and it took four and a half hours [to complete that]," Jorissen said. "The bank actually did the counting."

Jorissen and Flores agree that they had no expectations.

"We were just going to be grateful for what we got," said Jesse Flores, Carroll Hall senator. "[The money] is going to help a lot of people."

Some had expected the sum to reach half a million dollars, but "that's what people were saying when they saw the piles of money in the room," Jorissen said. "It seemed like a lot."

Keough senator John Cannon agreed.

"It was overwhelming to see all the bills coming in. Seeing all that money made it appear much larger than it really was," he said.

The $270,981 combined with the $40,000 or more that the University has raised pushes the contribution to more than $300,000.

In an effort to help the victims of the attacks, the police officers and the firefighters were selected to receive the money.

"It's one thing to have been in the building and to have been one of the casualties and it's another to risk your life and leave your family to save someone else's," Flores said.

After so many innocent people lost their own lives, the Notre Dame community sought to make a difference in some way.

"A number of students and faculty had voiced a desire to help with the relief efforts in some way," Jorissen said.

Student government teamed up with Father Mark Poorman, vice president for student affairs, and Father Richard Warner, director of campus ministry, who had already started a fund for the firefighters and police officers.

"We were seeking to find a way to steer the University. We were trying to find a powerful and fitting way for the Notre Dame family to demonstrate its support and gratitude for our nation's heroes," Cannon said.

"And we just wanted to do that as a collective whole — everyone in the Notre Dame family."

Student government and University officials met the Tuesday before the game and needed to find volunteers within 24 hours, with three days for planning.

"Almost 400 students volunteered — way above the 300 student volunteers we needed," he said.

"It was so awesome that so many people were willing to help especially with such a short notice," said Flores.

Along with Warner and Poorman, student government was able to create venues for people to donate money and make an impact. The Sunday vigil and the collection baskets during basilica masses complemented Saturday's effort to raise money during the game.

"We're very happy with this and we certainly will be able to make a difference," said Jorissen.

Although student government is going to keep looking for ways to aide with the victims in New York and Washington, there are no plans as of yet for other future projects.

Minutewomen spike Fairfield into Stag-nation

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

Before Tuesday's match against Fairfield University, Massachusetts volleyball Head Coach Bonnie Kenny predicted a "dogfight" between the two teams. Little did she know how much of a battle her squad would have to endure.

In the end, however, the Minutewomen had the bigger bite, as they survived a grueling five-game match to defeat the Stags Tuesday night. The Maroon and White jumped out to an early 2-0 lead and managed to hang on as Fairfield battled back and forced the deciding fifth game.

"I thought it was one of the best matches that I've ever been associated with," Kenny said. "It was a very good volleyball match."

Janeen DeMarte led the Minutewomen with a team high 16 kills and added 18 digs on the defensive side of the ball. Senior leader Lauren Vander Veen chipped in 15 kills and sophomore Nitia Small terminated 13 kills and contributed 10 digs on defense.

For the Stags, Conny Paul and Joanne Saunders were both key factors in the match, just as Kenny predicted prior to the match-up. Paul slammed home 27 kills for Fairfield, while Saunders was nearly as effective on the offensive end with 20 kills. Although both players were a nuisance and difficult to contain, the Maroon and White were able to emerge victorious due to a well-balanced attack.

"Conny Paul killed us," Kenny said. "But we had five people playing good volleyball, while they only had three."

"I thought we did a really good job on Saunders," she added. "She wasn't nearly as physical as they needed her to be [Tuesday] night."

Game one saw the Minutewomen gain control of the match after an early deficit to take the game 30-28. Small and senior Lymarie Llovet put home four kills each in the opener. Game two saw much of the same, as the Minutewomen gained control after exchanging the first few points with the Stags. DeMarte put home six of her 16 kills in the second game and had a .500 hitting percentage as the Maroon and White took a 30-25 win.

However, the tide drastically turned in the third game. With UMass up big early, the Stags stampeded back to tie the score at 13, and eventually took a six-point lead at 26-20. A mini-rally by the Minutewomen was not enough to overcome the Fairfield onslaught, as they dropped game three 25-30.

"I think we got impatient, and wanted it to be easier than it was going to be," Kenny said. "We were all working too hard to get it over too quickly."

The Stags managed to tie up the match in game four thanks to a 10-0 run midway through the game to go up 16-26. The Minutewomen battled to within six but were unable to completely overcome the deficit as they fell 25-30.

But the Maroon and White buckled down and squeaked out a tight fifth game that saw multiple ties and one-point differences in the score. When UMass took a four-point lead at 12-8 after an ace by freshman Amy Chan, the Stags reeled off a few points of their own and cut the lead to 13-12. However, the Maroon and White closed the door and ended Fairfield's spirited comeback as Lauren Vander Veen combined on two team blocks for the final two points in the 15-12 victory.

"This match could have gone both ways. We are two very evenly matched teams," Kenny said.

Judging by the stats, this assertion could not be more correct, as the hitting percentages between the two teams were nearly identical. The Stags hit for a .260 percentage, while the Minutewomen ended with a similar .253 killing percentage. UMass also finished with 12 team blocks, while Fairfield nearly duplicated that mark with 11.5 on the game.

Kenny attributed her team's victory not only to its play, but also to the attitude it sustained during Fairfield's rally.

"We were able to sustain a very high intensity the entire match," she said. "We stayed aggressive, and were not afraid to lose at all."

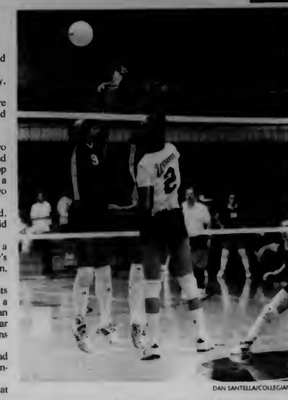
UMass returns to action this weekend as it hosts the two A-10 representatives from the Buckeye State, Xavier and Dayton. Both teams come into the weekend as two of the top teams in the conference and the Minutewomen have quite a challenge ahead of them if they hope to come away with two victories.



"We have a tough weekend ahead of us," Kenny said. "We'll need to have two back-to-back matches like we did [Tuesday] night to win them."

The Lady Musketeers come to Amherst on Friday with a record of 7-1 and are led by senior Sara Bachus, last year's Atlantic 10 Player of the Year. Bachus will be hard to contain, as she has amassed nearly 1,200 kills for her career.

The Flyers will be equally tough, as they handed Xavier its only loss of the year this past weekend and currently have a record of 7-3 on the young season. Dayton is led by Susan Westbrock, a First Team All-Atlantic 10 selection last year and one of the conference's best players. Grabbing two wins will be no easy task against this tandem of talented squads.

"We're going to have our work cut out for us, but I'm glad we're playing at home," Kenny said. "I just hope we can maintain the same intensity [from the Fairfield match]."

Game time is 7 p.m. on Friday and Saturday nights at Curry Hicks Cage.

Horoscopes

VIRGO (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – A conflict of interest may be unavoidable today, but in the end you can satisfy both your desires and your needs in good measure. Don't be fooled by those staring eyes, those muffled laughs, those quiet whispers – it's all about you.
SCORPIO (Oct. 22-Nov. 21) – I'm getting the vibe that you're just reading this horoscope casually. Do not underestimate the power of the Collegian.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You are overcome with ambiguity today. You must decide Mariah Carey- diva or skank?
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Ponder this: If underwear had pockets it would be more socially acceptable to wear in public.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You're in no mood for extra bother in any aspect of your life today, so you'd better be sure to streamline your own activities. Remember Melissa Hammel loves getting mail, send her a postcard.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You're not likely to be impressed by those who are all talk and no action today. On the other hand, there is surely a place for calm discussion. But a huge brawl is always more fun.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – A little bit of luck and your own characteristic foresight can take you a long way today – and land you exactly where you want to be. That would be on the beach in Cancun.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – It may prove hazardous to navigate your own emotional landscape today without first choosing a clear and firm destination. Be prepared. Like the Boy Scouts.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may find it necessary to analyze every detail today, but in the end you will have to make a decision one way or the other. You have already chosen wisely, you've picked up the Collegian.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You'll find yourself talking directly to one who has been out of touch for too long – and today, the relationship can start anew.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You're in the mood to do something new for yourself today, and the opportunities are virtually endless. See if you can't surprise yourself! But don't try jumping out at yourself, it never works.

Crimson looks the part of a winner

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Both teams wear similar colors: the Massachusetts field hockey team sports maroon and white, while Harvard University dresses in crimson and white.

Sometimes the two squads look so much alike on the field that it is difficult to tell them apart. And for the casual observer of yesterday's showdown in Cambridge, it might have been especially confusing.

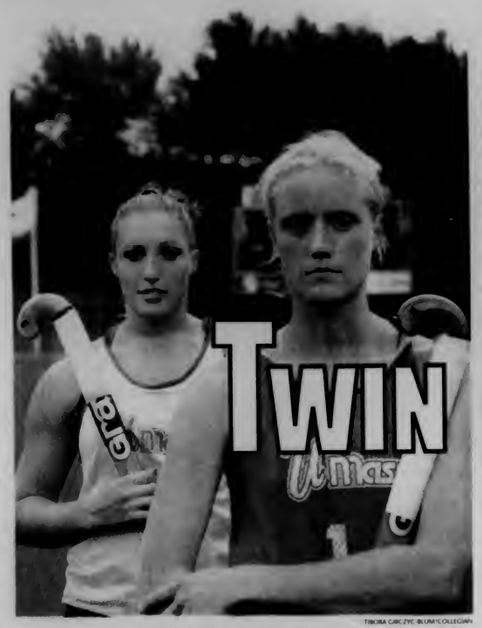
Because even though they wear similar colors, Harvard and UMass have never played much alike. The Minutewomen have almost always clearly been the superior team, dominating the series between them.

In fact, before yesterday UMass had only lost once to the Crimson, that game coming all the way back in 1984.

Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, the two teams seem to have suddenly switched places. For it was not UMass crisply passing the ball, frustrating the competition with stingy defense and having an iron wall in net, but instead Harvard that accomplished all of these things, on the way to beating the Maroon and White handily, 4-2, on its own turf.

With the loss, the Minutewomen dropped to 2-4 (0-0 Atlantic 10), while the Crimson improved to 4-2.

"We had the momentum for awhile but we didn't take advantage of our chances," back Anke Bruemmer said. "I still think we are an equal team with them but maybe we just didn't believe in ourselves."



In the beginning of the game, the two teams battled it out without letting up a goal, and visions of last year's 1-0 double overtime defensive struggle popped into the heads of everyone watching.

However, while it took 94 minutes for UMass' Patty Robinson to knock home the lone goal to give her team the win a season ago, this year's contest saw Harvard freshman Kate Gannon blast the ball into her opponent's net a mere 14 minutes in.

This gave the Crimson an early 1-0 lead, but the Minutewomen would come storming back. Two minutes after Gannon's score, Maroon and White senior leader Bruemmer drilled home a penalty corner to tie the game, with assists from Stacey Blue and Erika Whiston.

From that point on though, Harvard would take control of the contest.

The penalty cornerstones of field hockey

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

They don't call them goals for nothing.

Despite countless cliches that say otherwise, scoring is what field hockey is all about. If you can't put the ball in the net, you can't win. Period.

But "offense wins games, defense wins championships," right? Try telling that to Princeton, which allowed four goals total in the entire 1998 NCAA tournament and still ended up playing bridesmaid to Old Dominion.

Even the smartest players, say from a program such as Harvard's, wouldn't dare subscribe to the idea that "the best offense is a good defense." The Crimson played the best defense possible for over 93 minutes last year against Massachusetts and still lost. Try telling a squad that's just been defeated 1-0 in double overtime that scoring isn't important.

But luckily for UMass, its field hockey team has a good offense, the best offense, the kind of offense that could indeed win championships. For three years running it has enjoyed a luxury known as Anke Bruemmer, a towering blonde scoring machine who has blasted home at least a dozen goals each season.

Heading into her senior season, Bruemmer has suddenly gotten a little help lighting up the scoreboard. As the 6-foot German native prepares for one last assault on the UMass field hockey record books, she now lines up with a 5-foot-10 phenom who many feel will replace her as the physical force that spearheads the Minutewoman attack.

That phenom is freshman Ashley Gilbert.

"You can never really predict the future; you can only see what you want to see," Head Coach Patty Shea said. "But Ashley is someone who has the size and athleticism to have a great career here."

"It makes you comfortable knowing that there's someone taking over your spot who you know is going to be successful," said Bruemmer. "After I graduate I'll still follow UMass field hockey, and Ashley is someone I'll always look for big things from."

It's hard not to look for big things from the Maroon and White's twin peaks, who are known on the UMass practice field simply as "the big girls."

Though they bring comparable physiques to the game, Bruemmer and Gilbert come from markedly different sports backgrounds.

Throughout 13 years of club level hockey in her native Germany, the 6-foot Bruemmer focused on using her powerful frame to exploit opponents on the hockey field. Though she dabbled in other sports recreationally, Bruemmer had little choice but to concentrate on the one sport she could play – both indoors and out – year round.

"In Germany you have to pay to play for a club, so time-wise and finan-

Jeremy Cain (low right) will hopefully return to the gridiron this Saturday against Hofstra. He has missed two games this season due to injury.

In search of Pride

Speedy Hofstra next for UMass

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Despite being two of the fastest guys in the lineup, they were both last to finish sprints Wednesday night in practice.

Still, no one really took notice.

As their teammates darted by, howling beneath the lights of Richard F. Garber Field, Jeremy Robinson and Anton McKenzie just kept to a leisurely jog – side by side – from midfield to the end line, and back.

The two defensive backs weren't concerned with joining the end-of-practice scurry. Their tunnel vision didn't allow it. As far as the Massachusetts football team's secondary was concerned, Saturday's game at Hofstra had already begun.

"They've got two wide receivers that are outstanding," said Head Coach Mark Whipple, referring to Pride flankers Kahmal Roy and Charlie Adams. "Both guys will play in the NFL. They're the two best receivers in the league and they're on the same team."

After starting the season with three consecutive losses, UMass (0-3, 0-1 Atlantic 10) must travel to Hempstead, N.Y. Saturday to face The Pride (2-1, 2-1 A-10) on the artificial turf of Hofstra Stadium in what surely could be the Minutemen's toughest defensive matchup of the year.

In three games Roy has caught eight touchdowns and totaled 432 yards. To that, Adams has added two scores and 272 yards. Both headline quite possibly the fastest offensive team in Division I-AA football.

Minutemen cornerbacks Eddie Bowman and Nate Long will be called on to man the dodgy duo, with help ready from Robinson in the deep man zone and McKenzie on underneath routes.

In last weekend's 35-7 loss to Delaware, Robinson had two interceptions and McKenzie added a pick of his own. But stepping in front of the Hofstra playmakers will be a step up in degree of challenge.

"The scary thing about these guys is that you can have good coverage, you can be draped all over them, but Roy is going to go get it and Adams is going to go get the ball," Whipple said. "You just have to mix your coverage and get a couple hits on them."

Tossing the football for the Pride will be Rocky Butler. Butler completed 11-of-20 passes for 215 yards and four touchdowns and added 122 rushing yards and a score in Hofstra's defeat of Maine last Saturday, 51-44. The senior leads the A-10 in passing yards (902) and passing touchdowns (10).

The Pride is averaging 40.7 points per game and just over 459 total offensive yards this season. UMass lands nowhere near those marks, averaging just 12.3 points and 260.7 total yards per contest. The Minutemen have been outscored 115-37 so far this season.

"We're going to have to get at least 30 [points] to win the football game," Whipple said. "I think we're certainly capable of doing that, and that's what we plan on doing.

"It's going to come down to the team that takes care of the football and make plays. And they've made a lot more plays than we have this year."

Redshirt freshman Matt Guice remains as UMass' key component to the execution of the Maroon and White offense. In UMass' two division games, Guice has looked shaky at best, and has failed to make good decisions in the pocket. Last week in Delaware, he was unsuccessful in stringing together a complete drive, as the UMass offense failed to tally a single point. Guice went 20-of-33 for 182 yards in that game, but threw two interceptions and lost three fumbles.

Whipple remains confident though that Guice will make some significant progress in the coming weeks.

"He's got the character and ability of a Todd Bankhead," said Whipple, comparing his youngster to the quarterback of his 1998 National Championship team. "And it'll come out. I've worked with him enough that good things will happen before this year is out."

DeShon Hardy, Guice's favorite target last week, caught ten passes against the Delaware defense for 135 yards. The junior is averaging just over five catches and 80 yards per contest and will need to continue his ways in order for UMass to have any shot at tainting The Pride.

Stonewall speakers lecture on identity

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

For years, University of Massachusetts gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender [GLBT] students and faculty have taken part in the Stonewall Center Speakers Bureau. As speakers, they share their experiences with members of the local community, and try to expand awareness of the issues of sexual difference.

Zan Goncalves, a doctoral candidate in the UMass English Department, joined the Speakers Bureau in 1994. She decided to write her PhD thesis, "Speaking Our Truths: Literacy, Sexuality, and Social Action," on the experiences of her fellow speakers.

Yesterday afternoon, Goncalves delivered a lecture, "Insiders, Outsiders and the Discourse of Social Action," as part of the LGBT Studies Lunch Lecture Series. The lecture was based on her thesis research.

"As speakers, I think we can benefit from examining the language we use," she said. "It carries with it ways of thinking. Discourse defines what is normal.

"Homophobic discourse," she continued, "defines heterosexuality as the true, good experience of sexuality. Conversely, it defines homosexuality as bad or false. It positions people who identify as homosexual as criminals or sinners. It defines our reality."

Goncalves asserted that one of the goals of the speakers is to counter homophobic discourse.

"We use personal stories," she said. "We both help our audiences identify with us, and build bridges between insider and outsider territories."

She described how students would position themselves as "insiders." They could, for example, talk about their traditional families, or their status as UMass students, hoping to introduce points that audiences would identify with. They might also, however, describe growing up as "outsiders," and the alienation that they felt based on their sexuality.

"We would make our audience think, 'What am I, an insider or an outsider too?'" Goncalves said.

She added that speakers would sometimes inadvertently use homophobic discourse.

"Once, two speakers were asked if they believed that homosexuality was biological or environmental – the old nature or nurture question," she said.

"One said, 'I would never have chosen this.'

"It was clear that they would have preferred to be anything but gay."

In addition to delivering her lecture, Goncalves opened up the floor for comments and questions by attendees.

Denise Beaudet, a Northampton resident, expressed gratitude that unintentional homophobia was mentioned.

"It makes me cringe whenever I hear someone say, 'I never would have chosen to be gay,'" she said. "I feel you choose everything you are, by choosing to accept yourself. I accepted it – I said yes."

The subject of inclusion within the confines of the GLBT world was also addressed.

"Did you notice insider/outsider conflicts within the gay community?" asked Joseph Derosier, a suphomore Social Thought and Political Economy major.

"It happens around race a lot," Goncalves said. "There are also a lot of transgendered people who feel like they're on the outside of gay culture."

Daria Fisk, an assistant coordinator of Labor/Management Workplace Education Programming, asked Goncalves about the place of bisexuals in the insider/outsider discourse.

"It seems problematic in both communities," Fisk said. "Do you think that [the discourse] is a tricky thing that bisexual people find themselves in?"

Goncalves responded that bisexuals often feel oppressed by both gays and straights.

"As long as we think that difference makes us outsiders, then there's always going to be oppression," Goncalves said. "There's a whole discourse about bi-phobia. There's even more of it, perhaps, in the gay community than the straight community."

Senofer Stead, a junior double-major in Spanish and BDIC, commented that bisexuals often feel devalued by gays.

"It's often seen as 'just a phase,'" she said. "People say, 'We'll give you some time, and you can decide if you're with us or not.'" She described how, earlier that morning, she overheard someone say, "Straight is straight, and gay is gay, but bisexual is just trendy."

Goncalves is in the process of finding a publisher for her thesis, and is in talks with the University of Nebraska Press. She hopes, however, to find a way to make her thesis readily available to students and professors.

The Lunch Lecture series will not be held next week. It will continue on Friday, Oct. 19, when Chantal Nadeau, a professor of communication studies at Concordia University, will present, "The Sexual Borders of a Nationalist Agenda: Bill 32 and Same-Sex Partnership in Quebec."

SGA Senate elections ratified

Concerns over By-Laws result in three abstaining

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's Coordinating Council met on Wednesday night in a successful effort to ratify this year's SGA Senate elections.

Council members had announced concerns regarding the elections prior to Election Day, however, the elections took place. Passing with two percent more than the needed five percent student vote, this year's Senate elections were almost complete.

Members of the Coordinating Council met again to share their concerns regarding the ratification of the elections. Those concerns were based primarily on the fact that rules were not followed. Title Eight of the SGA By-Laws states that one elections commissioner is required to be at all five voting booths throughout the election day. However, this did not occur for the second election in a row, thus raising questions within the council.

Questions were raised by two members regarding why the Elections Commission did not take time last year to secure commissioners for this year's election.

"I think it was irresponsible on behalf of the leadership," council member Mike Taugher said. "The leadership, the people we pay day in and out, weekdays and weekends had ample time to get this together, and they didn't."

Taugher continued, stating that he would be abstaining to vote on ratifying the elections due to the legalities.

"Just to clarify things, I will be abstaining my vote because I can't consciously say yes due to the fact that the SGA has violated our By-Laws, and that's a serious offense," Taugher said.

Council member Bryan Thompson agreed with Taugher by explaining that he too could not vote 'yes' for this year's elections.

"We need to make a statement with these elections and we need to be responsible and follow up and do what we say were going to do as the SGA," Thompson said. "The leadership should have recognized prior to the elections that these problems would be happening."

Other council members disagreed by explaining that it was a different leadership at the time the poor decisions were made, and that by breaking more By-Laws in order to fix the election's mistakes would not benefit the SGA.

"You can say rules are rules, but just because they are rules, doesn't mean that they are always right," council member Michel Whitehouse said. "We're not here for the rules, we're here to help and work for the student body. They don't care about our By-Laws, they care about parking, the dinning ha Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders agreed by explaining that the SGA was faced with a bad situation that should have been taken care of, but wasn't.

"We just came off a rough year and we need to break the cycle," Saunders said. "Someone dropped the ball, and the fact of the matter is that we're the ones here now, dealing with it."

Saunders continued by explaining that he will do everything in his power to see that this does not occur in the Presidential and Trustee elections this spring.

"I give you my word that in the next elections there will be at least five elections commissioners," Saunders said. "What we need to do now is ratify these elections, remember them, learn from them and make changes."

The elections were ratified by the Coordinating Council with a vote of two absentions and three votes in favor of them. The Council passed the Senate elections with two votes in favor and three absentions.

Council members expressed triumph as well as disappointment following the meeting.

"At least three of us realized that violations occurred," Taugher said. "Even if they hadn't ratified the elections, the same situation would have occurred in the next election. The leadership last year didn't live up to their responsibilities. They should have been here day in and day out, and they neglected their responsibilities."

Saunders expressed his excitement following the decision, stating that a dark chapter has been closed within the SGA.

"When you break it down, the SGA is really simple, but people take it further," Saunders said. "People worked to the best of their ability to follow the By-Laws. They [the Elections Commission] worked their asses off to have a good election, and as a result the SGA and student body will reap the benefits."

The SGA's newly elected Senate will have two days of orientation beginning on Oct. 1-2 in which they will prepare for the first Senate meeting, to be held on Wed. Oct. 3.

Ills and getting into classes, and that's what we are here for, to work things out."

MassPIRG outlines current goals

By Joanna Zeifan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) held its introductory meeting in the Campus Center on Wednesday to inform students about the organization and to recruit new members.

This meeting focused on MassPIRG's goals on how to make not only the University of Massachusetts a better place, but also on how to make the whole community more environmentally aware.

"Students don't have a vehicle to create social change and to get involved with the community," said Bill Powers, the vice-chair of MassPIRG state board. "MassPIRG provides it."

The meeting focused on seven main campaigns that MassPIRG is undertaking for this year. The seven main undertakings are Water Watch, Students for a Sustainable UMass, the Book Swap, Hunger and Homelessness, Keep It Wild, Open Space and Healthcare.

Each of the seven different campaigns will work to improve one aspect of environmental problems. Water Watch, started in 1998, has done huge amounts of work to clean up our waterways. In the past three years this group has arranged 185 waterway cleanups and removed 548 tons of trash from waterways all over Massachusetts, according to MassPIRG literature. They are planning to continue to fight against the pollution of water.

The Students for a Sustainable UMass say that they are trying to help clean up the campus. They want to begin to clean up the dining commons, first by getting rid of all the Styrofoam cups in the dining halls, and then taking care of the food waste problems by working hand-in-hand with the Hungry and Homelessness program by giving all of the unused food to the needy. They also are planning to start a "tree-free" UMass.

They are going to implement a three-year system where, by working with faculty and students, they are going to help stop the waste of paper and trees by getting recycled paper into each department instead of the non-recycled material currently in use. Also, this project is working on an energy task force that will educate and help motivate this campus to become more energy efficient.

The Book Swap is going to be a place where students can bring their books to a MassPIRG rep that will sell the books for them. According to MassPIRG, this helps everyone because not only can students buy cheaper books, but it also gives students an outlet to sell their books back for more money than the Textbook Annex will give them.

Hunger and Homelessness is a group that is working on helping to feed and clothe the homeless. In the past, MassPIRG has raised over 10,000 dollars to combat this problem and has put on five events to help fundraise.

Keep It Wild is an organization that is trying to help protect public and national forests, parks, wild refuges and monuments. It is holding an eco-conference and a pledge drive to help raise money to save trees. The ultimate goal of Keep It Wild is to get laws passed to permanently protect public forests.

Open Space is another group working to save forests. This group will lobby to try and get laws passed to permanently protect Massachusetts's open space.

"We lose 16,000 acres of open space each year to land developers," explains Iris Vicencio-Garagay, the MassPIRG environmental advocate. "We need to make sure that public land is protected forever."

The Healthcare project is trying to help motivate a universal healthcare plan with a new campaign against HMO's.

"The United States is the only nation in the world that doesn't give healthcare to everyone," explained MassPIRG member Alex Gould. "Our healthcare system is putting profits before people. We need a system that puts people before profits."

Overall, the MassPIRG meeting was focused on what students can do to get involved to make a change. Student and MassPIRG representative Mike Keeny explained that not only is it truly important to get involved, but it is really very easy.

"I see myself and the situation now, there are lots of problems. There is a lack of mobilization of citizens and students, and this lacking is because of apathy. Apaths in the sense of unawareness and in the sense that there are so many problems, what can one person do?" Keeny explained. "MassPIRG solves the problems by educating people and showing them what they can do. You can get involved with a five minute conversation with me."

Keeny and student Will Savage put their opinion forth in their rap for Students for Sustainable UMass: "If you choose to stand up the solution is clear - if you choose to stand up the solution is here."

Turf grass management on rise

By Zane Brown
The Reveille (Louisiana State U.)

(U-WIRE) BATON ROUGE, La. — The mention of turf grass management as a major field of study does not strike much excitement or curiosity into the mind of a normal Louisiana State University student.

However, this area of study is expanding in Louisiana as well as around the country.

From golf courses to sod farms, from NFL stadiums to suburban lawn care, a variety of opportunities exist for students concentrating in turf grass management, said James McCrimmon, associate horticulture professor and turf grass research specialist.

"There are jobs available as golf course superintendents, sports turf managers, home and commercial lawn care companies, sod farm managers, and some go into technical sales with chemical and fertilizer companies," he said.

For someone who is not familiar with the field, McCrimmon defines turf management as the science and practice of establishing and maintaining turf grasses for golf courses, athletic fields and lawns.

The major is offered within the Department of Horticulture," he said. "The degree is a B.S. in horticulture with turf grass as an option within the Department of Horticulture."

Turf grass management as a field of study has existed at LSU for 12 to 15 years, McCrimmon said.

But it's been around the Southeast since the 1940s at schools like Georgia, Mississippi State, Florida, Texas A&M and North Carolina State," he said.

The University of Massachusetts first initiated the field in the United States in 1927, McCrimmon added.

"Rutgers, Michigan State and Penn State also had faculty involved in turf research in the '20s and '30s," he said.

There are two specific turf grass classes — Horticulture 4056 and Horticulture 4090 — at LSU, McCrimmon said.

"The students take other related courses," he said. "All of them intern where they go and work on a golf course or an athletic field. Some go to work on sod farms."

A sod farm is a business in which different kinds of grass are grown and marketed to homeowners, athletic fields, and golf courses, said Aaron Wade, a turf management student and vice president of the Turf Club at LSU.

The Turf Club is a student organization designed to promote turf grass management as a profession, McCrimmon said.

"The Turf Club is a student chapter associated with the National Golf Course Superintendent's Association of America, also known as GCSA," he said. "The golf course aspect of the club has a few more benefits than the student club alone does. And anybody can be a member, if your major is history, English or whatever. It's open for anybody."

The club has been more than helpful in providing students with experience and education for their future jobs, Wade said.

"I went to Canada to a turf grass convention this summer," he said. "I attended conferences and field days in education and marketing."

Lance Heltz, a turf management student and president of the turf club, said the organization helps with students searching for jobs as well.

"The club helps students network with the local GCSA chapter," he said. "You meet with people and get your name out there. We wanted to be able to have a professional organization to put on your resume."

As far as finding a job after graduation, McCrimmon said the search is not very difficult.

"The GCSA sends students job ads," he said. "They have an employer referral system. If you want to stay local, it's a lot easier, but getting a job is not as hard as it sounds. I've been here for five years, and every turf student has gotten a job. There are about four job offers for the average turf student, and that's based on just local opportunities coming out."

Salaries for turf grass managers range from about $22,000 a year to a six-figure salary, McCrimmon said.

"A golf course superintendent makes anywhere from $33,000 to $75,000 for an 18-hole course, while an assistant superintendent makes $22,000 to $35,000," he said.

The salary basically depends on the region and education of the manager, Heltz said.

"An athletic field manager varies on whether you're at a major college or professional team or not," he said. "They make anywhere from $22,000 up into six figures."

At the top of the turf profession sits turf manager George Toma — a pioneer of sports turf management.

"He makes seven figures, does the Super Bowl every year, and he is an NFL consultant on sports turf," Heltz said. "He has a vast amount of experience and was in the right place at the right time. It goes with experience, just like anything else."

Post Sept. 11 rumors

It seems that in America, no tragic event is complete without a barrage of ridiculous rumors and conspiracy theories in its wake. The September 11 attacks are no exception.

E-mail servers across the country are being inundated with the story of a man who escaped from the upper floors of one of the World Trade Center towers by "surfing" a piece of wreckage to safety. Apparently, he simply attached himself to a chunk of falling debris, and by successfully riding the air currents which surrounded the building, managed to land on the ground unscathed! Of course, the story is completely false. There are no documented cases of anyone surviving such a fall. It would be impossible for anyone, with or without "air currents", to do so. But the truth is unlikely to diminish the story's popularity.

This tale brings to mind one of the legends of the Columbine tragedy. Who could forget the saga of brave Columbine student Cassie Bernall, who was asked by a gunman if she believed in God? Cassie answered, "Yes," only to be shot point-blank in the head.

The only problem with this tale of "heroism" is that Cassie Bernall was never asked any questions about God at all. A different female student was asked if she believed in God, and responded, "yes," and walked out alive.

These legends, while false, are at least relatively harmless. They were designed to be uplifting, and to bring comfort to those who mourn. Unfortunately, there are also rumors being circulated of a significantly darker nature.

Among them is an e-mail message being forwarded with alarming frequency. Barbara Mikkelson, a noted debunker of urban legends, documents on her website the popularity of a message suggesting a connection between the hijackers and Microsoft:

"Type 'q33ny' into Microsoft Word using the Wingdings font," the message instructs. "The image you will receive will be of an airplane, two towers, a skull-and-crossbones, and a Star of David."

What makes this so shocking, the message claims, is that one of the airplanes to hit the World Trade Center was Flight Q33NY! Surely such a phenomenon is too odd to be a coincidence!

This story, too, is nonsense. The flights involved were American Airlines Flight 11 and United Airlines Flight 175. Regardless, to suggest that Bill Gates was somehow in league with hijackers in an anti-Semitic conspiracy, and decided to encode a message in his "Wingdings" font, strains credulity considerably.

Perhaps most disturbing of all, though, is a clearly false report being circulated that no Jews were killed or even injured in the attacks – that somehow, all of the Jews who worked in the World Trade Center somehow knew to stay home on September 11! The purpose of this fabrication is to suggest that Jews were somehow behind the attacks, and decided to blame that attacks on Arabs.

One of the few things as terrifying as the prospect of hijackers flying planes into crowded office buildings is the prospect of opportunists using the attacks as an occasion to invent false rumors. Any e-mail message claiming to suggest something "extraordinary" about the attacks should be taken with a grain of salt.

Red, white and blue:

our flag keeps us together

"We've all come to look for America"
- Paul Simon

KATIE LANDERS

I never really thought about it, to tell you the truth. The American flag. Thirteen red and white stripes, fifty stars. Now, all of a sudden, they're everywhere. So being the studious girl that I am, I've decided to do some research and learn a little bit about my flag.

Mind you, this is the first time that I've ever done any research for an editorial.

It might have been in the first grade when I learned that Betsy Ross had agonized over sewing the first American flag. This was way back in 1777, just after the Revolutionary War. Funny how it came to be Betsy Ross that sewed up that flag. Betsy was old George Washington's seamstress (not mistress; she sewed up his collars and shirt ruffles). Washington came in riding on his horse to her home and showed her a sketch design of a flag to represent the nation.

The first flag had the 13 alternating red and white stripes. Washington wanted white stars, 13 of them to represent each of the colonies, set in a blue background like a new constellation.

But thanks to Manifest Destiny and the Gold Rush, America pushed west and 13 colonies became 50 states. It obviously wasn't overnight, but you knew that.

And so now there are 50 stars on the flag, each representing a state in our great nation.

I've seen more flags in the past week than I've seen in my entire life. There are flags on cars in the windows and the antennas. They're waving off pick-up trucks, and on the grills up front. At houses they have swayed at half-mast from poles. Paper flags were raised high among the masses of Red Sox fans when the team returned to Fenway two weeks ago.

We, as Americans, pledge our allegiance to that flag (allegiance: devotion or loyalty to a person, group, or cause). There's a day in June that we dedicate to that flag.

Do we know why we do this?

Patriotism. The United States is the greatest country on Earth. The flag is more than just some fabric in red, white, and blue. The Pledge of Allegiance is more then something that we learned to recite at the age of five. The flag is what links Americans of every race, creed, gender or religion.

The flag means freedom. Free to say and think whatever our hearts desire. Free to vote, purchase alcohol and keep our mouths shut if it's going to get us in trouble. The flag means happiness, to dream in a land that is solid beneath our feet.

I recently flipped through the Time magazine that I get thanks to some credit card I must have signed up for freshman year, and found some interesting numbers. Three weeks ago, Wal-Mart sold 116,000 American flags. Wally World only sold 6,400 flags in 2000. Americans have suddenly found pride in their country.

Will this pride last?

Flags now wave high on their poles. Television has returned to its regularly scheduled programs with a telethon here and there. The wicks of candles have been burnt down to nothing. I don't think that Americans are forgetting altogether. I think Americans are moving on.

We've found our heroes. They're in police officers and firemen. They're in volunteers. We sing songs that we haven't sung since elementary school and pop culture has designed some new ones with video that will break our hearts all over again.

And we woke up today and took a breath because that's what life is all about. Right?

taking solace in our past

HEATHER LAVIGNE

Remember when things were simple? I know, quite well, how hard this may seem at a time like this. With sounds of fighter jets patrolling the Quabbin and many of our hometowns locked down with the most intense securities, it may be hard to remember a time when things were different.

In Stop & Shop a few days ago, I overheard an older woman say she wished that she could go back to "the good old days."

A warm sense of calm came over me as memories rushed back, a calm that I have not felt since long before the events that have occurred during the past two weeks.

I know lots of people on campus who have been grasping for a way to cope. To be honest, it took me a while to pull myself away from CNN; it just was the only thing to do. To watch, to listen, and to hang on every word the news anchor told us.

It is now a time for us, however, to rebuild parts of our lives that we lost temporarily. Regain that ability to feel happy and thankful. For those of you who may not have found that yet, maybe I may offer some comfort in bringing you back to some of the good old days of yours.

Remember how funny it was when your dad would step on a flipped over Lego block? "Fffff...what the .. jeez! Who left these here!!?" Or if $1 million was riding on this question: "What did Alf eat?" all of us would be a whole lot richer. We'd wake up in the morning and flick on cable to see the likes of Go-bots, Hong Kong Phooey, and The Jetsons, and eat our Rocky Road or Boo-Berry cereal. The world was at peace because, "by the Power of Greyskull", He-Man and Battle Cat would make it all okay. Or She-Ra, ya know, if that's what you were into.

We rocked out to New Kids, some even having the bed sheets to prove it, and we thought Hammer pants were the end-all to being the "coolest." We were all 2 Legit, even though we were ten. All the girls knew all the words to "The Little Mermaid" soundtrack and probably some of you guys out there, too. We thought that Paula Abdul and the cat in the "Oppsites Attract" video made a good couple and we thought Boy George was singing "comma comma comma Chameleon" because we just didn't have a clue in the world.

The fun didn't stop there, though. Oh no, because even with all of today's modern technology, we will always have had the coolest toys. We spun ourselves on the Sit and Spin until we felt that dizzy "if I spin just one more time I'm going to spew" feeling and it was FUN. Mmm, who could resist the mouth-watering smell of tiny masterpiece cakes from your very own Easy-Bake Oven? And correct me if I'm wrong, but did it NOT scare the crap out of you when Perfection would pop about 50 billion pieces in your face, or was it just me? But after all was said and done, after a long day of finger paints and Play-Doh, dreaming good dreams never seemed easier. In a time where rock-paper-scissors was the end-all way to settle any dispute, what problems couldn't be solved?

We all know that there were some moments that we would like to forget as well. Yes, girls, our entire wardrobe were either spandex or neon or, (shiver), both. Guys, you don't get off easy either. You did wear your clothes backwards to be cool just like the Mac Daddy and the Daddy Mac. You really did say "don't have a cow" and we've had the "way...no way... waaaaay!" conversation far too many times to count. Remembering these things brings me back to a simpler time, where the most upsetting thing was that an eyeball fell off of my Raggedy-Ann doll and my mom was right there to sew it back on.

To be honest, I wouldn't want to grow up in this day and age for anything. I admire the younger children for their courage in living in the world that we do today. You can't just give the evil-doers the "Care Bear Stare" and everything will go away. It's just not that simple anymore.

We've got to face it. No matter how we try, our past will never escape us. But, to a point, do we really want it to? In these times, when our younger brothers and sisters, cousins, nieces and nephews are growing up on the verge of wars and terrorism, I thank my lucky stars that I have the memories that I hold in my heart. I cherish everything that I had in childhood and hold them close for dark days like these. I hope you all can look back and crack a small smile from your good old days and no matter how bad things may seem at points in the future, we must keep living our lives to their fullest potential. Keep making memories that we can look back and smile on, someday far away.

Machine Head's superiority is not "All in Your Head"

MACHINE HEAD
Supercharger
Roadrunner

Let's cut all the small talk: the new Machine Head rocks.

That's something you have to do when listening to Supercharger, just drop your expectations and really get to the heart of the record. Is this really the return to Burn My Eyes/The More Things Change... that was promised? Or is it just a continuation of The Burning Red? These are the kind of things that will have you thinking way too much, and missing an album that scorches all the way through.

The air-raid sirens and distorted yells of "Declaration" and the double bass drum (semi) assault of "Supercharger" are about as far as you can get from the soft and introspective bookends of Machine Head's last album, The Burning Red. But Supercharger retains the best elements of that effort, goes deeper into their catalogue for inspiration, and comes up with enough new tricks to make it feel like all of their work, exciting and current.

Machine Head originally ignited the metal scene with 1994's Burn My Eyes, which is easily among the best metal albums ever made. It was a blueprint for countless other records throughout the 90s and today, combining massive, crushingly deliberate guitars with the punk-metal attitude of early Maiden. There were no gimmicks to be found, just insane heaviness.

The pattern continued on 1997's excellent The More Things Change..., which found the band essentially perfecting their formula. It was at this point MH could choose to either stay on the same path, dropping solid but expected albums in the Slayer or AC/DC vein, or chart a more challenging direction.

The band chose the latter, and 1999's The Burning Red was a mixed bag. In retrospect, it's a great, if slightly confused album, but at the time it seemed a little too different from the traditional MH. A forcefully friendly radio single (the excellent "From This Day"), a hip-hop feel to Robb Flynn's vocal delivery, an ill-timed (in light of the to-this-day glut of them) cover of The Police's "Message In a Bottle," and an overall simplistic musical approach was jarring to fans raised on the old Machine Head.

Supercharger starts off much the same way as The Burning Red. "Bulldozer" has the same sort of build/release dynamic as "Desire to Fire," and comes complete with Flynn's hilarious (in a good way) aggressive boasts ("Bulldozer feeds upon the weaker as they fall/ Bulldozer crushes...ALL!"). "White-Knuckle Blackout!" is the same kind of riotous straightforward rocker as "The Blood, The Sweat, The Tears," and the first single, "Crashing Around You," has the same pop feel and emotive vocals of "From This Day."

The differences come after a few listens, when the songs reveal themselves as fleshed-out, fully realized versions of their Burning Red counterparts. "Kick You When You're Down" and "White-Knuckle Blackout!" just feel confident, borrowing a little from previous songs like "Struck A Nerve" while still experimenting with new structures of their own.

The album as a whole feels more confident, so much so that a track like "American High," a humorous piece of high camp that spouts every rock n' roll cliche in the book, while it may seem unnatural to fans, fits in quite well.

Also unlike The Burning Red, the new album doesn't trail off towards the end. "All In Your Head" is a brilliant combination of rapid-fire verse delivery and an eerie chorus, "Nausea" is the kind of barebones "fuck off" metal song that Godsmack only dreams it can do this well, and "Deafening Silence" is the most graceful "ballad" MH has ever created.

You will shudder at Flynn's sometimes-laughable lyrics ("No one can break these nuts/ these lips ain't kissing butts"). You may not (understandably) appreciate "American High."

Maybe you think "Crashing Around You" is too radio-friendly. But as much as Machine Head has changed over the years, Supercharger is still a blazing album, nearly as affecting a statement as Burn My Eyes, and that's saying a hell of a lot.

Machine Head co-headlines the Road Rage Tour with Fear Factory, Ill Niño and Chimaira on Sunday night at the Palladium in Worcester.

Vega's Songs are simple, soothing, sensuous

By Sam Wilkinson

SUZANNE VEGA
Songs in Red and Gray
A & M Records

Suzanne Vega's musical career has been strange. A folk singer whose biggest hit was remixed by European DJs before it ever got popular, Vega has been well known for her stark musicality. While she had limited success on the charts, she has achieved more acclaim in recent years, as she has worked to combine her frank guitar with a sensuous sound.

Songs in Red and Gray features Vega's unmistakable delivery. She's always found a way to sound as if she is intertwined with the music, as if we wouldn't get the guitars without her voice and we wouldn't get her voice without the guitars. To Vega's credit, while some try to distance themselves from their music (Tori Amos and her attempts to vocally elevate herself above her piano), Vega is grounded by the simplicity of her acoustic guitar.

Yet her ability to follow that guitar wherever it goes is amazing.

Vega first appeared on the scene with "Luka," sung from the perspective of an abused nine-year-old girl. It was a few years later that "Tom's Diner," an a cappella song from Solitude Standing, was remixed by European DJs DNA and immediately became a crossover success. After that, Vega basically disappeared from the charts. She'd had her hit, she'd had her "discovered and remixed" song, and that was pretty much it for her career.

Except she didn't go away.

On 99.9F, Vega started to debut a new, richer sound. Instead of the androgynous music of her past – she's alluded several times to abuses that occurred at the beginning of adolescence that may have contributed to her self-presentation – she was suddenly sensuous. Abandoning her total dedication to the acoustic guitar, she experimented with other sounds, including a dabble or two with a slight industrial sound on "Blood Makes Noise." Then came Nine Objects of Desire. Critics lavished praise on the album, touting Vega's sudden maturation from a rough-around-the-edges folksinger into something much more specific: a performer who could be both simple and lavish.

Now, perhaps, we might add playful. Songs in Red and Gray features Vega continuing to succeed through her immersion in the simple music that backs her. Lyrically, Vega is a poet – "Tom's Diner" and "Luka" were popular, yet poetic, hits – and her lyrical rhythm is unmistakable. Instead of forcing syllables into lines where there is room for no more, Vega's ability to weave her vocalization into the steady repeating rhythms forces the most out of her songs.

"Last Year's Troubles" is a simple guitar song spiced with mandolins and violins. With a skip and a pop, Vega sings of troubles being "old-fashioned/the robber on the highway/the pirate on the sea." She is dismissive of our former concerns, noting only that as they've become less important, other problems have risen to take the formers' place. It might be pop music, but the message is downright depressing. "Widow's Walk," is similarly concerning; Vega is simultaneously lush and stark. Her presentation leaves it up to the listener.

She seems to be constantly playing games. Are her bare lyrics meant to make us submit? Is her verdant lyricism meant to soothe? ("I'll Never Be Your Maggie May" is a stunning statement of purpose. Vega won't be left behind; she won't be forgotten. She'd rather hide forever than be forgotten. She'd prefer to be the one in charge. With a sweet guitar lick, she lulls the listener into a false sense of security before declaring, right away, that she isn't going to be the woman from the song. Vega just says it, rarely with added saccharine.

But there are times when even Vega, so praised for her brutal honesty, is downright playful. "If I Were a Weapon" is Vega listing her litany of deadly possibilities: she might be a gun, she might be a needle, she might be a pocket-knife, she might be a hammer. Of course, she immediately doubles back on herself; she's more interested in taking care of the situation facing her. She might be a weapon, but she'd rather be herself.

Such is Vega, a true individual whose music expresses her intense independence. And despite her many masks – she was stark in her early career, she was lush later on – she has rarely stumbled. In her maturation, she's sampled from a wide variety of musical influences and on Songs in Red and Gray, she's found an apparent middle ground of incredible results.

Giants? Perhaps...

By Matt Dentler
Daily Texan (U Texas-Austin)

(U-WIRE) AUSTIN, Texas – John Flansburgh of They Might Be Giants sits in a San Francisco hotel room, and he's safe. The world around him is calmer than it was a couple weeks before, as he's now on tour with his famous band. The hours of boredom and tourism that fill a band's pre-gig afternoon permeate Flansburgh's voice as he seems willing, almost longing, to speak to someone outside of his safe, hotel-room cocoon.

Only weeks before this quiet, calm moment, Flansburgh was in a car trying to get out of New York City alive. He and his band were supposed to fly out of New York on Sept. 11 to begin their tour. With the tragic events that unfolded, Flansburgh and company were forced to find another way out - another way into the heart of America.

"It seemed very possible that it was the end of the world, and it was very disturbing - a profoundly disturbing thing," he said. "We basically just got in a car and drove cross-country and met the [tour] bus in Lincoln, Nebraska."

Flansburgh said it was hard to leave his home, and it may be even harder for him to come back.

"I live right across the East River from Manhattan, and I can see the skyline of Manhattan when I walk out the door. Nothing could be stranger than having the World Trade Center replaced by a giant plume of smoke," he said.

They Might Be Giants has set out on a national tour this fall, promoting their new release Mink Car. The album is another solid set of quirky, smart pop/rock songs that fans of all ages can easily love. It is also the group's first release since achieving a new generation of fans thanks to the theme song from Fox's popular series "Malcolm In The Middle." For a band that started making records 15 years ago, a resurgence in mainstream popularity is uncommon but nice.

The group began as the brainchild of two Johns – Flansburgh on guitar and John Linnell on accordion. Both shared vocal duties and used those vocals to sing about subjects rarely heard on Top 40 radio. With albums such as 1989's Lincoln and 1992's Apollo 18, They Might Be Giants – which takes its name from the 1971 film – helped define and establish the alternative rock scene in America. They were one of the pioneering college rock bands. But what has kept them so sheltered from the household-name status of their college rock cohorts R.E.M. and The Pixies is a perpetuating desire to remain outside common culture.

"We've never been really of the moment," Flansburgh said. "Whether it has been English bands or post-grunge bands, we're sort of permanently on the outside."

They briefly came into the spotlight with their 1990 album, Flood. That work stands as one of the most important alternative rock records ever made. Songs such as "Particle Man" and "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)" became hit singles around the nation, and TMBG seemed set for the big time. But instead of capitalizing on this momentum, the band stayed true to its obscure roots and refused to sell out. They simply continued to make weird yet intelligent songs about historical figures – "James K. Polk," New Remains, rivalry – "NTC vs. Adam Ant" or science facts – "Why Does The Sun Shine?"

To the unfamiliar, they always seemed like a very awkward band that makes music for very awkward people. But in actuality, they were one of the first smart rock bands. It may be geek rock to a certain extent, but without TMBG, we might not have Weezer, Ben Folds or Cake. They're simply a highly original band that just didn't want to write the same rock songs as everyone else.

"When we started, there was a long list of things we really felt were overplayed or grotesque about pop song writing," Flansburgh said. "We kind of avoided romantic love as a topic in general, and we've always just been trying to cook up less-tired ideas for songs."

"We don't have a master plan. We're just trying to write songs that are worthy of repeat listening. And over the years, we've kind of loosened up about the love song thing. In some ways when we're making records, we're thinking we're The Beatles, but we probably come across a little bit more like we're Steely Dan."

As Flansburgh sits in his San Francisco hotel room, thousands of miles from a war-torn home, he prepares for the night's gig. In some ways, it's the perfect time for a They Might Be Giants show. Their music and their performances have been renowned for broadening horizons and lifting spirits. It's a responsibility to rock that they take very seriously.

"I feel what we do is already so diametrically opposed to the spirit of [the attacks of Sept. 11], I feel like carrying on, in and of itself, is an act of defiance," he said. "There's something very celebratory about music and there's something about it that reinforces the most positive things in the human spirit. And it's a tremendous release to play."

And no one ever knows what to expect when they do play, or who exactly will have that tremendous release. As Flansburgh puts it: "The audience is king."

"In some ways, I wish we were less tuned into rocking the crowd," he said with a laugh. "Lots of performers sort of demand that the crowd go along with them. Like, 'I'm gonna play two ballads in a row, goddammit!' What's funny is that I don't think there's anything wrong with that impulse. But, for whatever reason, we have a real desire to rock the crowd. And it's real obvious when you're rocking the crowd, and it's real obvious when you're not."

They Might Be Giants continues to pursue more musical ventures, and hopes one day to compose music for a bizarre independent film production. Over the years, for a band that makes unusual pop music, they've been confined to some comfortable outlets (TV show themes, movie themes, commercial music). But it's all part of the plan to make as many people understand the band, even if they aren't currently understood.

"I would expect nothing less than to be completely misunderstood by the pop mainstream. We're not part of a trend. What we're doing is not really a reaction to the culture," he said, pausing for a moment to think about this issue. "We're not important. I think what we do is really interesting and really good. Don't get me wrong, I don't have a bad self-image. But not everything in the culture has to be driven by cultural relevance."

So They Might Be Giants will continue to ride the fringes of the musical middle road and make memorable songs for anyone with an open mind. On some days, Flansburgh wouldn't have it any other way.

"We've never wanted to sing anthems. We never wanted to be the band for a generation. It's not in our character," he said. And it's true. They are able to span age gaps while remaining quietly on the outside. "It's a good place to be, in terms of longevity. You're never yesterday's news."

Verve Pipe no longer "The Freshman"

No longer "Freshman" in the music industry, The Verve Pipe is gaining the respect of critic's with the release of their fourth album.

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

THE VERVE PIPE
Underneath
RCA

Many said that the Verve Pipe reeked "one-hit wonder" when their gritty rock ballad "The Freshman," off of their 1996 album Villains, was played non-stop on all the radio stations back in 1996 and into 1997.

However, the captivating song hinted that this band, still in its infancy, could grow to become more than a flash in the pan like many of the other pop rock bands of the 1990's.

Their most recent outing, Underneath, shows the band stretching its wings and living up to the potential they displayed with their previous four albums. This one, though, is by far their strongest to date. Each track stands firmly on its own, as the band keeps a thoughtful grasp on not only what is radio-worthy but also what people want to hear. Each band makes one album that stands above the rest, and Underneath could very easily be The Verve Pipe's crowning achievement to date.

Lead vocalist Brian Vander Ark has one of the mostractive voices in pop rock, which makes the songs so appealing to listen to. His raspy vocals sound like something out of the hard rock genre where bands like Creed and Lifehouse take up shop. Vander Ark has instead focused on crooning romantic ballads and melodious pop tunes instead, and it suits him just fine. His vocal talent shows unusual emotion and character-depth as an artist.The best cut on the CD is the song "Colorful" (which can also be heard in the new movie Rock Star).

At first listen, the song could sound like your generic pop ballad, very similar to their claim-to-fame "The Freshman." Just like the song's title, though, it is brighter and more vibrant than any other on the CD. The song explodes into sounds of guitars and percussion, and it won't be too long before you think you're listening to a number one hit single on your local commercial station. Its gritty effervescence is immediately addicting.

But the first single from the album is "Never Let You Down," an energetic ode that is a worthy premiere radio tune for the album. It's a sugary, guitar-driven rock song that is a mix between your generic Collective Soul song and Third Eye Blind's "Never Let You Go." And look how similar the titles are! The background vocals by band mates A.J. Dunning and Donny Brown give it added flavor as it kicks into high gear.Another standout track is "I Want All of You."

Beginning with simplistic syncopation and acoustic guitar, the song about sexual wanting continues to build in intensity until it reaches its exits explosive climax. Vander Ark sings with passion, with the background vocals adding a unique, haunting quality.

"Medicate Myself" is a striking opposition from the rest of the cuts found on the album. It is forceful in its fierce instrumentation and dares. Its dissimilarity from the rest of the songs might catch the listener (and fan) off guard, but the change isn't for the worse. It is evidence that The Verve Pipe is multifaceted in their music abilities, throwing the listener a loop with this edgy song.

Some of the songs unfortunatels fall into the vast chasm that is the pop music landfill, like "Only Words" and "Miles Away," songs with trite lyrics and bland music that's been done all too often before. But luckily, these occurrences are rare. Theoutweighs the bad, and the aforementioned tunes are soon rescued by ones like the bluesy funk that makes up "Local Boys," the vigorous upbeat quality of "Happiness Is," and the twangy melancholy behind "Gotta Move On."

The title track arrives at the end of the CD, and is a fitting closer to this album. The falsetto hook of the song brings to mind a mellow and tranquil mood that peacefully flows after coming off of what is, for the most part, a rock album. The placement of this song at the end, as well as allas all the others to their designated slots, shows great skill in the layout and production of the album – making Underneath feel like something closer to a story than just a rock CD.

Due to the music's wide appeal Underneath is an album that both fans and new listeners of The Verve Pipe can enjoy having in their collection.

With their latest release, the band has defied the many critics who once upon a time dubbed them a one-hit wonder group. It is still uncertain where the band will ultimately reside in the pop rock field, but if Underneath is an indication, it will most likely be on top.

with the hardest A-10 team," he said. "That says everything. We'll have a real good idea where we are after the game."

UMass has been able to gain confidence with each game but is not over-cocky that things will go its way completely this season.

"We have more confidence this year, but we're both 0-0 (conference wise) going into this game," Koch said.

UMass will be taking the field to challenge the Rams on Saturday at 1 p.m.

ple are in the 5-foot-5 and 5-foot-4's."

But while the size match-up may be an issue, the Wildcats are likely to strategize right into UMass's positional strength.

"They play a real funky-looking system of play," Rudy said. "It appears to be almost a 3-6-1, so there are a lot of people in the middle of the field, which is really our strength."

The middle of the field just happens to be patrolled by three seniors, all-conference player Brooke Bartlett, Kat Machamer, and Katelyn Jones, with former A-10 Player of the Week Martha Conover rounding out the foursome.

"[Brooke] worried the hell out of Rhode Island so much that they put a key attacker, No. 5, [on her] and [she] still tore her up. She is going to worry other teams and make them change."

While the midfield is strong and the forwards have been impressive, it is the defense that has caused Rudy headaches over the past week or two, despite posting victories in each of the last games.

"Although we got a victory against Rhode Island, I don't think we were pleased the manner that we got it," Rudy said. "Our attacking was very good, but our defending at times has been very shaky in terms of decision-making and skills. That is something that we really want to rectify."

Rudy's disappointment may lead the way to some changes in either strategy or personnel in the defense, with some discussion already taking place on the practice field.

"We are really close to changing some things up [with the defense]," Rudy said. "We had a good day with that yesterday."

The New Hampshire offense has two very good players that will be the focus of the UMass defense this afternoon. Freshman Chiara Best and sophomore Ana Tobon make up an impressive and very young one-two punch for the Husky offense.

"Best plays really up high," Rudy said. "She is all over the field. They don't get a lot of attack unless it goes through her."

Tobon is UNH's leading scorer and will force UMass's defense to look for No. 5 all game long.

"[Tobon] plays underneath the frontrunners," Rudy said. "She is a playmaker and a connecter. She is going to be a ghost at times where she mills around underneath the attack, not real visible, and all of the sudden she pops up and she's open. That is something we are really going to pay attention to."

Rudy has one other worry in regards to this afternoon's game—the fact that it is a weekday game, something that seemed to take the spring out of the Minutewomen's steps against UConn back on September 5. UMass lost its only game that Wednesday—which was the first day of school—by a score of 5-0.

"Hopefully that is out of our system," Rudy said. "The rhythm of going to classes and trying to get a meal and trying to do everything you do on a game day, as opposed to playing on the weekend where you have your total focus."

Bears caught in UMass waterfall

Minutemen lap Brown in Amherst waters

By Jennifer Dutkowsky
Collegian Correspondent

Russ Yarworth, the head coach of the No. 13 Massachusetts men's water polo team, described Wednesday night's opponent, the Brown Bears, as having a "historically strong program."

History does not seem to be helping the Bears in the present though, as UMass swam circles around them, winning 20-7 in its home opener Wednesday night at Amherst College.

Dominance came early for the Minutemen, who set out to prove that history does repeat itself. Having already beaten Brown on Sept. 9 by an 8-4 score on the final day of the Harvard Invitational in Cambridge, UMass began its Bear hunting again early in the game, when junior Justin Houck blasted his first of three goals past the outstretched arms of the Brown goalie, with only about one minute elapsed.

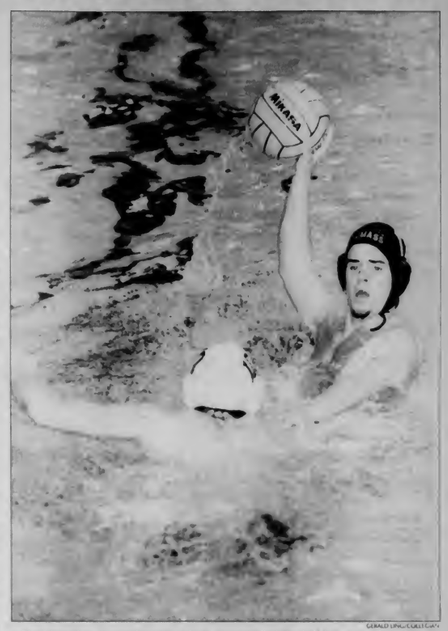
Shortly after, a short period of time passed where UMass had what Yarworth called "two defensive lapses where the score went from 2-0 to 2-2."

After that, the Minutemen put their heads back into the game and finished what they had started. By the time the game ended, eleven different Minutemen had sailed the polo ball past the Bears goalie. With each goal it became more evident that the team was well on its way to not only its eleventh win of the season, but finally realizing the potential that Yarworth said he has seen in them since the beginning.

Massachusetts Senior Co-Captain Mike Foley, who was recently named College Water Polo Association (CWPA) Player of the Week, brought his total number of goals scored up to 21 in 24 quarters played, with a hat trick on Wednesday night. He was joined by juniors Houck and Andre Syce, as well as freshman Adam Zobler, in the three-goal category.



Twenty-four has become the number for senior Greg Frayer, a former CWPA Player of the Week. He added one goal Wednesday night to bring his total number of goals this season to that mark.

The Minutemen didn't dictate play just on the offensive side though. They also demonstrated what Yarworth called "excellent defensive communication and commitment."

Lead by senior goalkeeper J.R. VanderWall, who had seven saves, including an impressive save on a penalty shot late in the second quarter, UMass's defense had the Bears spending more time chasing than attempting to score.

Before the team meets George Washington, Navy, Bucknell, and Princeton in the North/South Challenge this weekend in Princeton, N.J., Yarworth says the team will be working to "improve extra man play and continue to work on offensive and defensive game plan implementation."

If this weekend's win was any indication of what the rest of the season will look like, it might just turn out to be a lazy swim up stream toward post-season success.

On a collision course with history

Field hockey looks to avenge its coach

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Oh Huskies, how do we hate thee? Let us count the ways...

Perhaps the bitter rivalry between the flagship state universities of Massachusetts and Connecticut stems from the fact that the two schools are so alike. Both are nestled in the farmlands of the rural Northeast, with similar student bodies and similar athletic programs.

And in the sport of field hockey, they are like a pair of wounded animals trying to seek shelter in the same cave as autumn sets in.

The Minutewomen (2-4) travel to Storrs, Conn. this Saturday for a 1 p.m. clash with arch-nemesis UConn. The Huskies (3-4) limp into the contest having dropped two straight, the most recent a 4-2 loss to Brown on Wednesday night in Providence.

UMass finds itself licking similar wounds, having dropped its Wednesday night contest at Harvard by the exact same score.

"Defense is the hardest part of the game to put together, and we're still trying to figure each other out," said senior co-captain Jill Fantasia, who watched her team surrender its 20th goal of the year against the Crimson. Last season the Minutewomen allowed 18 goals total in 24 games.

Handling the Huskies would be the perfect remedy for the Maroon and White's woes. Last year, the Minutewomen upset then-No. 7 UConn 2-1 at home and went on to win 11 of their next 12 games en route to the NCAA quarterfinals.

It was the program's first win over the Huskies since 1993.

"It seems like every year, we really come together as one when we play UConn," Fantasia said. "Last year was amazing; it was both a sense of relief, because we hadn't beaten them in so long, and a sense of accomplishment."

To fully understand just how satisfying last year's win was, it is necessary to examine what transpired between these two perennial field hockey powers since the last UMass win:

1999 – The Huskies put an end to the Maroon and White's season with a 2-1 win in the NCAA quarters. To make matters worse, the game was played on UConn's home field.

1998 – The Huskies escape from Richard F. Garber Field with a 2-1 victory in double overtime.

1997 – Following a ceremony to dedicate the turf on Garber and honor former All-American Kyle Rothenberger, the Minutewomen drop a hard-fought match to UConn by a score of – you guessed it – 2-1.

1995 – After taking a year off from playing each other, the two teams met at Garber with an outcome of.... Yes, UConn 2, UMass 1.

One would think that UMass coach Patty Shea has the numbers 2-1 emblazoned in her mind when she thinks about UConn. But instead, she probably associates the Huskies with a different set of digits: 1981.

That's the year the Minutewomen, led by All-American goalkeeper Shea, made it all the way to the championship game in the first-ever NCAA Field Hockey Tournament.

Where they fell to... drum roll please... UConn. But at least the score wasn't 2-1. It was 4-1.

"Every game, you go out there and play for yourself, your family, your fans and of course, the coaching staff," Fantasia said. "If we can get a win and at the same time get a little revenge for Patty, it's all the better."

Senior Jill Fantasia was just 1-year-old when her coach, Patty Shea, played goalie for UMass against UConn in the NCAA's first-ever Field Hockey Championship Game.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Brent Plumley, No. 9, and the Massachusetts men's soccer team will host URI Saturday at 1 p.m. on Totman Field.

As conference slate opens, O'Brien, Minutemen streaking

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

Can the Massachusetts men's soccer team continue its streak?

Just one month into the season, the Minutemen have already declared themselves a top contender in the Atlantic 10 conference.

Now 4-2 on the season, the Minutemen have won three straight, including two consecutive shutouts. UMass will look to keep momentum on its side this weekend, as it begins the A-10 slate with guest Rhode Island.

The Minutemen are coming off a huge 7-0 win over Maine last Saturday. The shutout was the second in a row for goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn, who upped his career UMass shutout mark to 11. He is the first Minuteman netminder in seven years to reach double digits in shutouts. Outstanding performances by O'Quinn have earned him accolades from the A-10 as Player of the Week and from WHMP as WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week. The conference honor is the first for the men's soccer team this season.

"I'm very pleased," Head Coach Sam Koch said. "It was certainly well deserved."

In the 7-0 blasting of Maine, Jeff Deren and Ptah Myers both netted two goals, while Yuri Morales, Derek Rhodes and Gabe Barnard each added a tally to the scoreboard. The Minutemen were able to take control of the game early with four goals in the first half, and UMass will be looking to do similar work against URI this weekend.

The Minutemen are completely healthy, as John Lytton has fully recovered from his mild concussion he suffered last week in the game against New Hampshire.

Like UMass, the Rams visit Totman Field after a shutout against George Mason University in last weekend's Kappa Classic in Kingston. Freshman star Emerson Aquilera, who was named to the A-10 Rookie team this fall, helped in the victory by putting one in the net. Gareth Elliot, a senior out of Belfast, N. Ireland, also got on the board, netting his 67th career goal for URI. Elliot is currently ranked 8th in career goals.

The two-time A-10 Champion Rams are 3-1-1 this fall, wit their only loss coming to Yale. URI is currently the No. 1 team in the conference, but the Minutemen are going into Saturday's game with confidence, and believe that it will be a tight match-up.

"This [game] is going to be as good as it's been all year," Koch said.

The Minutemen have been improving with each game. The 90 minutes against URI will be the first A-10 game of 11 that the team will play this year. Koch said that a "new season" starts this Saturday.

Youngsters looked upon for rebound

By Melissa Shattuck

The Massachusetts men's tennis team heads down to Providence, R.I. this weekend to play in the Brown Invitational tournament.

The team won its season opener last Saturday against SUNY-Binghamton, 4-3. The powerful No. 1 doubles combination of senior Steve Prisco and freshman Scott Sans-Leeb defeated Dimitri Litvak and Brad Davidoff, 8-5.

The No. 3 doubles team composed of Philip Rodriguez and freshman Reid Stubbs beat Brad Sherwood and Chrishnu Lolabran, 9-7.

In singles competition Prisco, Sans-Leeb and Stubbs were all victorious, defeating their opponents in straight sets.

Minutes later, UMass faced Division III Williams College and was defeated 4-0. Three of the six singles matches were called off because the Minutemen had been swept in doubles and the first three singles matches, making it impossible for the Maroon and White to mount a comeback.

Because Head Coach Judy Dixon could not be reached for comment, the slate for this weekend's Invitational was unavailable at press time. One thing is for certain; whoever it faces, UMass must perform at a higher lever than it did against Williams.

With such a young lineup, ebbs and flows in performance can be expected. But the team will look to regroup from its inconsistent ways and continue with its plan for conference control.

The fall season is more of a warm-up for the spring campaign, so there is time to correct the drawbacks of youth.

Sans-Leeb and Stubbs have both showed promise and with the departure of former No. 2 Brent Davis, Dixon will need both rookies to step up if the Minutemen are serious about contending for the Atlantic 10 title.

Stubbs went 1-1 in singles play on the weekend, taking his match against Binghamton but coming up just short to Williams's No. 4 singles, in a hard-fought 3-6, 6-0, 10-7 decision.

Sans-Leeb won his only singles match (his singles match against Williams was called) against Binghamton. The freshman teamed with the veteran Prisco to split his two doubles matches.

UMass will certainly need its freshmen to step up if it hopes to compete this weekend. And surely, the duo hopes it has enough mettle to play like seasoned vets.

'Cat, UMass encounter should be jarring

By Jim Pignatiello

UMass, 13, New Hampshire, 9. Each digit represents the number of goals scored by its respective team this season.

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (3-1-1-0 Atlantic 10) has scored four more goals than UNH (2-3-3-1-1-1 America East), but the difference isn't impressive until the number of games played is also listed:

UMass 4, UNH 8.

With a Wildcat squad that is averaging slightly better than one goal per game, the Minutewomen should be able to keep the ball in their offensive third for the majority of the contest, today at 3:30 on Totman Field. But coach Jim Rudy is weary of the Wildcats' size advantage on both sides of the pitch, especially after a shaky outing in last week's 3-1 victory over Rhode Island.

"They are a really big, physical team," Rudy said. "They are much bigger than we are, which is a concern because we did very poorly in the air last week. You don't want to let them get too close to your penalty area with regularity, because they crash the box with some big, big players."

Even if the Maroon and White keeps possession of the ball in its offensive third, UNH will still have a distinctive size advantage.

"They tackle hard," Rudy said. "They are very aggressive. We are going to be attacking their huge defense [with some players pushing 6-foot-0] and our front peo-

Known for their physical nature, the Wildcats will look to use their size advantage against UMass today, on both side of the pitch. In turn, the Minutewomen will try and use its speed to off-set New Hampshire's strength.

Quabbin scare keeps park closed; officials on alert

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

Water authorities have sealed off all public access to the nearby Quabbin Reservoir due to the suspicious low-flying aircrafts that raised alarm on Sept. 22 in an already heightened state of alert on all infrastructures since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The FBI issued an alert on all critical Infrastructures following this month's terrorists attacks, to end on Oct. 11. As the Quabbin provides water for nearly one-third of the state, the low-flying planes and the report of a small, white object that dropped out of one of the aircrafts has been taken quite seriously by the authorities.

Although the planes violated the Metropolitan District Commission (MDC) regulations and flew well below the Federal Aviation Administration's (FAA) 500 feet required by law, many claim that low-flying planes are a relatively common occurrence.

Nevertheless, the State Police are working in conjunction with the FAA in an investigation to identify the pilots. The Massachusetts Water Resource Agency (MWRA) and the MDC have taken additional security measures in light of the month's events.

Despite speculation, MWRA Executive Director Fred Laskey upholds that there has been no threat made to the water system and that "the public should be assured that we're vigilant and that the quality of drinking water is being aggressively protected."

The MWRA and MDC conducted a full-scale examination shortly after the planes were spotted flying low over the Quabbin's visitor's center and dam. They also surveyed the area "with a fine-tooth comb" on boats over the next three days, according to Jonathan Yeo of the MWRA Public Affairs Office. Yeo said that the reported object has been ruled out as searchers were unable to locate it.

Yeo also explained that "one small little object cannot contaminate 412 billion gallons of water. You would need tankers of chemicals or biologicals to really contaminate the system," and that the alleged chemical attack as outlined in the press towards this event "is very impractical."

Massachusetts State Police Sergeant Ronald J. Sieberg confirmed that no evidence of the object has been found. However, Sieberg said that the reported object and chance of chemical attack on the Quabbin has not been ruled out by the police and is still under investigation.

On Sept. 22 the MDC and state police kept visual contact on the planes and sent a helicopter from the Westover Air Force Base to correctly identify one of them. One of the planes was flying very low over the visitor's center and dam, which Yeo said "was very inappropriate. Even if we weren't in [a heightened state of alert] I think someone would want to find that pilot and have a word with him."

But the alarm caused by the low-flying planes is partially fueled by the air of paranoia since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Yeo said. "You start seeing and imagining things everywhere, all the time."

According to Yeo, no organization has threatened any water supply in the country.

Any water supply, Laskey recognized in an interview with the Boston Globe, that any water supply has two threats: the contamination and the physical threat to dams and pipes. The MWRA has stepped up its security measures by placing state police at critical locations and have closed off the Quabbin Park, trails, fishing area, Winsor Dam Road and Visitor's Center as well as the majority of the Wachusett Reservoir. No decision on the deer hunt has been made.

The Wachusett Reservoir was closed on Sept. 25. However, authorities have allowed fishing in specific areas. Water normally reaches the Wachusett Reservoir from the Quabbin and is there treated with chlorine before it goes to Marlborough. At Marlborough, the water is diluted with fluoride and stops once more at the Norumbega Reservoir in Weston where it is injected with another disinfectant before it goes into the pipes that supply 2.2 million people in 46 cities and towns.

Beginning this week, the National Guard will fill in for the state police, as the police have been working very long hours with this month's increased security at places such as local airports and the water reservoirs.

"Things really did change on Sept. 11," Yeo said. "We're redoubling our security in light of the events."

Arab women's rights lecture topic

By Dawn Moore
Collegian Correspondent

Professor Nawal El-Saadawi, an Egyptian doctor and journalist and a worldwide speaker on women's issues, had the audience mesmerized with her talk on Arab women's issues, Sage Hall at Smith College last Friday, Sept. 28.

El-Saadawi is currently a visiting professor at Montclair University in Montclair, New Jersey and a member of the advisory board for Meridians, a journal of feminism, race and trans-nationalism published by Smith College.

El-Saadawi has devoted her life to struggles against imperialism and inequality in contemporary society, and has been repeatedly punished by the Egyptian government through arrest and imprisonment.

In her writings and articles, El-Saadawi has addressed taboo issues of global inequalities and women's sexuality, consistently condemning the concept of "family honor" and virginity. She has protested against assassinated Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's and current president Hosni Mubarak's regimes and has criticized what El-Saadawi describes as the manipulation of Islam by Arab governments. These themes have drawn fire, causing her books to be banned in some Arab countries.

In 1982, she founded the Arab Women's Solidarity Association, an international organization dedicated to "lifting the veil from the mind" of Arab women.

El-Saadawi talked about the Taliban's treatment of women. The Taliban, the ruling faction in Afghanistan has been criticized by world governments for its gender laws. In the western world, repression occurs, El-Saadawi said because the women disgrace their family or bring dishonor in another way. She was recently the subject of international attention when the Egyptian government sought to divorce her from her husband of 35 years on allegations that she was anti-Islamic.

"The oppression of women is not only in Islam, but worldwide. And that we have to globalize our efforts in helping them," El-Saadawi said. "Unveiling the mind is very important, for a young girl's identity and for a woman."

An example was given of a 10-year-old Muslim girl who lived in Germany with her family. Her father wanted her to marry a man he had found for her and she refused. He took her out into the street, El-Saadawi said, and burned her to death. The court later ruled, El-Saadawi continued, that he was acting on behalf of his culture and was given a reduced sentence

"This happens every day in the Western World and it is not acceptable," El-Saadawi said. "We are not safe anywhere."

As El-Saadawi talked about the Sept. 11 attacks, she said how she lost at least 100 friends in the attacks, but that "war will never cure the problem because war itself is a kind of terrorism."

Hands immediately went up for questions but El-Saadawi asked the audience to wait until the end.

When asked about the United Nations World Conference Against Racism, held in Durban, South Africa, she said some thought it was a success, others a failure.

"We shouldn't just be concerned about terrorism here but anywhere it happens, and kills innocent people," El-Saadawi said. "Osma Bin Laden is only one man. If one man can have that much power, than imagine what we can do globally as a whole.

"We can beat this terrorism and get better treatment for ourselves as a people. We have to brace humanity," El-Saadawi continued. "We have to train ourselves to come together so we can help solve the problem globally."

There was a book signing after the lecture with some of her latest works including Woman at Point Zero, Firdaus, Memoirs from the Women's Prison, and The Circling.

Delta Sigma Phi holds benefit tournament

By Melissa Shattuck
Collegian Staff

The brothers of Delta Sigma Phi organized a volleyball tournament to raise money for the American Red Cross in order to provide rescue relief to those in need following the terrorist attacks.

The tournament, which took place last Saturday had been in the works long before the attacks occurred, when brothers Christopher Ponte and Joe Gurowski first came up with the idea to plan an event that was both fun for those participating and offered a chance to help as well.

"We saw what happened in New York City and thought that it was good idea to do our part as the Greek-system," said Ponte.

Ponte went on to explain that he was pleased that a number of Amherst area businesses offered to assist them with the tournament, some of which included Stop and Shop, Coca-Cola, Big Y Supermarkets, Pizza Hut and Antonio's.

"We're really happy that a variety of organizations decided to help out to support such a good cause," Ponte said.

The tournament was double elimination with a variety of different teams. The teams consisted of brothers from all over the Greek system. Players from Phi Sigma Kappa, Alpha Delta Phi, Alpha Tau Gamma, Moore Dormitory in Southwest, and Delta Sigma Phi came out to play in the tournament.

Each team donated various amounts of money for the event ranging from $30-$150. All of the money that was raised in Saturday's tournament was donated to the American Red Cross New York City fund.

"Every little thing counts, and a lot of little things from a bunch of people really adds up," Ponte said.

"It's great that people came out and donated money, and that all of the brothers were able to come together to help such a good cause."

The tournament was open to the public, but a majority of the teams were part of the Greek system. Many brothers were pleased with the turnout of the event.

"This event benefits everyone, it brings the Greek system together, and at the same time we're helping out a good cause," said Delta Sigma Phi brother Ryan Young. Delta Sigma Phi president, James Singagliese was pleased with the outcome of the tournament.

"It's great that people came out and donated money, and that all of the brothers were able to come together to help such a good cause," Singagliese said. "We wanted to raise money and have fun; we have the resources, so why not put something together?"

Singagliese explained that the event seemed as though it was a good success, and that he felt as though everyone was having fun. The tournament raised approximately $500 for the Red Cross.

Annual Big E successful event
Crowds flock to fair despite rain

By Dawn Moore
Collegian Correspondent

Rain didn't stop the crowds at the Eastern States Exposition, as every year people were determined to come and have a good time. Spirits seemed to be high, in light of recent events.

The crowds were huge with families and children running to get on the rides. The smell of smoked pork, fried dough and other Big E favorites seasoned the air.

New rides and the giant Ferris wheel could be seen a mile away. Games of all sorts were being played, from basketball dunking to shooting the right dart, just to win that big stuffed animal for a loved one.

"It was a thrill just to walk through the park," said Colleen of Palmer, Mass. "I came to see the concert, but I also came for the food. You just can't miss it."

Contemporary soul diva Maya performed in concert, singing some of her latest hits including "Lady Marmalade" and "Case of the X."

"We didn't want to miss the Big E," Shaun Thomas said as he and his wife Betsy watched baby chicks hatch. "The New York tragedy took a toll on everyone and this was a good start to getting back on track."

Crowds were gathering everywhere from looking at the grizzly bears to standing around watching someone chop onions with tears in their eyes.

Sales pitches were all around with mops that glow in the dark promising to do the clean up job to your favorite chair massager. And people were taking advantage and spending.

At the horse competition, farmers came from all over bringing some of their best Clydesdale horses. The huge animals, usually used to pull large wagons, came from as far away as Ontario, Canada.

Whether it's the 200-pound pumpkins or the eight-pound miniature horse, the Big E had something for everyone.

Parking seemed to be orderly; even if some people had to park up to a mile away, they didn't seem to mind the walk. The Mandies of Ludlow said they had to park near the Big Y on Memorial Drive, but didn't mind the walk, because "it's a tradition to come to the Big E."

As the Mardi Gras parade marched by, it was hard not to think that one was in New Orleans. The marchers had colorful costumes and beads, along with children joining in. The parade was as long as the park.

Most of the booths had donation cups for the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I felt kind of guilty about coming, but needed to get back into the swings of things," Shana Henley of Enfield, CT said. "You can tell something happened, the atmosphere isn't the same.

"We have to get back in to our country. We can't let this bring us down as a people. The Big E is what America is all about. We like to have fun and enjoy ourselves," Henley continued. "We can't let what happened bring us down. This is my first year here and I intend to have a good time."

Park officials said the attendance seemed to pretty high despite the Sept. 11 attacks.

"People seem to be having a good time and that's what we want," a park employee said. West Springfield Police were patrolling along with the park's usual private security. "This is a regular New England event that we have every September, and we are pleased to see that people are coming out and having a good time."

Jerusalem - Israeli radio reported yesterday that troops from Israel on their way to work had killed two Palestinians. Nearly 14 others were injured near the village of Attara at a roadblock that had been raised early that day following overnight gunfire exchange between Israelis and Palestinians.

The Isreali military released a statement concerning the incident in which it explained that two Palestinian taxis had come up to the roadblock after the gunfight earlier in the day had ended. One taxi driver refused to obey soldiers' orders to step away from his vehicle. When both taxis reversed in order to leave the roadblock, the soldiers opened fire at the two cabs.

The other 14 people that were wounded mostly consisted of passengers, some of whom were shot after they attempted climbed out of the moving vehicles and run toward the Israeli army, the statement said.

"Despite my political meeting with [Israeli Foreign Minister] Peres, there is a deliberate escalation from military leaders and some political leaders on all fronts," Arafat told reporters in Cairo, where he was meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Following the end of peace talks between Israel and Palestine the death toll has risen to approximately 604 Palestinians and 164 Israelis.

Rome, Italy - The grandson of Afghanistan's exiled king and rightful head of the country told CNN on Sunday from Rome that the previous king, Mohammed Zahir Shah, did not intend to return to Afghanistan to rule the country. He explained that if Afghanistan's Taliban government collapses, then he would consent to serve as figurehead for the country in an effort to provide a unifying force for the people.

"His majesty would like to, as a symbolic figure, as a father figure, unite all the various different groups of Afghanistan to take Afghanistan out of this calamity," Prince Mostapha Zahir Shah told ABC's This Week.

The former ruler would be in a "role defined by the people of Afghanistan in a very democratic matter."

"This must be an intra-Afghan thing," Prince Mostapha told ABC's This Week. "We believe that the Afghans can do the job but ... they probably would need the tools to do the job to combat terrorism."

On Sunday, the Taliban supreme leader Mullah Mohammed Omar leveled allegations against the United States claiming that the country intended to replace them with a "puppet government" to replace the and cautioned that "if (the king) tries to come back to Afghanistan, he has chosen his destruction."

The royal family was removed from the country in a 1973 coup. At the time they were outside of the country and now they are living in Rome.

Prince Mostapha told ABC that the former king sent a letter to President Bush requesting assistance. He said he expects "another communication" to take place between the two.

The United States suspects the Taliban for harboring terrorists. One of the terrorists that the government is allegedly trying to hide is Osama bin Laden, an individual who is believed to be behind the September 11 terrorist attacks in both New York City and Washington D.C.

While the United States government has forewarned that impending military action may occur if the Taliban did not hand all suspected terrorists living in the country and take strides to disassemble terrorist training camps, the United States has not publicly supported replacing the current government.

On Sunday, White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card reiterated the U.S. policy against getting involved in creating a new Afghan government.

"We know that the Afghan people are being duped and used by the Taliban government right now," Card told Fox News Sunday. "And we'd like to see a more stable government for them. But we're not about nation-building here. We're about ridding the world of terrorists and making sure that no nation is a place where terrorists feel that they can get comfort and aid."

While that is the United States public standpoint an internal memo, acquired by CNN, that has been circulating around the White House shows support for removing the Taliban government.

"The Taliban do not represent the Afghan people, who never elected or chose the Taliban faction," said the memorandum summarizing the Bush administration policy and prepared jointly by key officials with the National Security Council and the State Department.

"We do not want to choose who rules Afghanistan, but we will assist those who seek a peaceful, economically developing Afghanistan, free of terrorism."

According to CNN, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-California, a member of the delegation said, "what we've got here is a country that the United States helped in the fight against Soviet imperialism and helped them free themselves. And then we walked away and provided them no guidance, in fact left them with Saudi Arabia and Pakistan, who had their own agenda. And thus, we end up with these people living in abject poverty and a horrible situation.

"We owe it to them to help them overthrow the Taliban terrorist regime, which represses them," Rohrabacher said. "We owe it to them to provide the humanitarian support afterward that can help build their country so it can be part of the world community."

One country that may be concerned about U.S. support for the original Afghan monarchy is neighboring Pakistan. The country officially recognizes the Taliban as the leaders of Afghanistan and would favor a campaign intended to directly eliminate bin Laden and his al Qaeda terrorist network.

But Prince Mostapha sought to calm the Pakistan government in his interview, explaining to ABC Sunday that the opposition wants to form a government that is "friendly to its neighbors," including Pakistan.

A group from the U.S. Congress met in Rome on Sunday with the 87-year-old former monarch, as well as associates of the opposition to the Northern Alliance, to converse about what type of government could be put in place to substitute the Taliban. The Northern Alliance controls parts of the country, including the northeast corner, and is currently against the Taliban.

Paramaribo, Suriname – Customs officials in Surinane have captured almost 50 percent more cocaine this year than last year, according to the Associated Press. Almost 400 pounds of the narcotic have been seized. Roy Zscusschen, head of the Customs Drug Force told the AP. Last year that amount only slightly over 250 pounds.

"I think the customs officers have gained a lot experience which enables them to spot potential drug couriers better," Zscusschen said in an interview with the Associated Press.

Over forty arrests have been made this year, compared to 58 in 2000. Zscusschen explained.

The drug shipments, usually bound for the Netherlands, have increased in size, Zscusschen told the Associated Press.

"People do not seem to take the risk of getting caught for small amounts anymore," Zscusschen said.

Two brothers were carrying nearly one hundred pounds of cocaine when they were busted in May, Zscusschen told the AP. It's the single largest take this year, he added.

More than half of the suspects used Dutch passports, Zscusschen reported to the AP.

New Delhi, India - Madhav Rao Scindia was one of eight people who perished Sunday afternoon when the small plane he was traveling in crashed, CNN reports.

The opposition Congress Party leader was traveling to the northern city of Kanpur. Several reporters and a high level official also died. Indian police confirm.

Roughly 180 miles outside of New Delhi, the Cessna C90 had engine problems, said CNN's Satinder Bindra.

"The plane was completely charred and burned," he said.

Scindia was India's former civil aviation and rail minister, says CNN. "The news is already causing consternation in political circles," Bindra told CNN. "It is a big blow, and supporters are gathering outside his home."

Scindia was 56 years-old.

Utah parking services face student law suit

By Jared Whitley
Daily Utah Chronicle (U. Utah)

(U-WIRE) SALT LAKE CITY - The University of Utah is not afraid of law student Steve Rinehart's lawsuit against Parking and Transportation Services.

On Sept. 5, Rinehart filed a "notice of claim," alleging that the university's parking fee charges were unlawful.

"In our view, the lawsuit has no legal merit," said John Morris, general counsel for the university.

The lawsuit contains eight different arguments, including accusations that the university has violated higher-education bylaws and unfairly profited off of students.

"[This is] the most poorly managed parking situation that could be imagined," Rinehart told The Daily Utah Chronicle earlier. He has attended several different institutions of higher learning in the state, including the university o and off since 1993.

Rinehart informed The Chronicle about cases where court action forced universities in New York and Wisconsin to stop booting and towing student vehicles. Another lawsuit forced Louisiana State University to stop writing tickets. Rinehart wants legal action to prevent the university from doing the same things.

Morris is not worried about the precedents Rinehart cited, because the rulings occurred in other states.

"Not every state has the same law," Morris said. "In other places, there are legal constraints on what a university can do about parking. Nothing that he alleges is in violation of Utah law."

Rinehart has not yet officially filed the lawsuit, rather a notice of claim.

According to Utah law, government agencies — including state universities — must receive 90 days advance notice before a plaintiff can sue them. When the 90 days following Sept. 5 are concluded, the university's legal counsel will turn the case over to the Attorney General's office, Morris said.

"I don't believe that any of the claims he makes, even if they're true, state a violation of Utah law," Morris said.

An employee in the university's mathematics department since 1993, Nancy Demello has seen "lots of parking changes and, in my opinion, not for the better — despite skyrocketing prices."

"Maybe this lawsuit will be just the eye-opener [parking services] needs," Demello said.

There is a strip of 17 reserved stops right outside Demello's office window. On an average weekday morning, she sees less than half of them occupied.

"It is the most unproductive, wasteful use of parking space I have ever seen," she said about the "money-making scheme."

An MPA student and researcher with the American West Center, Jennifer Robinson began riding the bus last spring after the parking situation "deteriorated."

"It's great," she said. "It takes less time to ride the bus than to drive here and look for a parking place."

Robinson thinks a problem with riding the bus is that too few students know about the program. The university pays the Utah Transit Authority about $1 million per year so that both students and employees can ride buses for free.

Rinehart has made a Governmental Records Access Management inquiry, a legal demand for information, upon parking services.

"Parking services has [until next week] to provide me with a whole host of information I've demanded ... and they're not happy about it, but they have to," Rinehart said.

Protesting is fine

More thought would be helpful

While Saturday's protest rally in Washington D.C. was certainly a cathartic moment - a chance for the 'other side' to be heard loud and clear, finally -some of the messages coming out of the Anti-War Rally seemed counterproductive.

Calling for peace is one thing; letting terrorists off the hook for their behavior is something else all together. What happened in New York City three weeks ago is unacceptable, regardless of our sanctions against Iraq, regardless or our defense of Israel, regardless of anything. What happened in New York City was the slaughter of some 6,000 innocent people, people who had never sanctioned Iraq, who had never defended Israel, who had never done anything to the attacking terrorists.

There definitely is an excellent argument against war: that in war, we would be no better than those that attacked us. Collateral damage is collateral damage; innocent lives are Innocent lives. If we were to indiscriminately attack Afghanistan, we occupy no higher ground than the attacks did.

But protestors seemed unwilling to make just that point. Instead, they thought it was the time for further complaint about George W. Bush's presidential victory (like petulant children who didn't get their way, we might add), further complaint against society and further complaints about the United States.

Where else in this world can dissidents freely speak their minds?

Where else in this world can they do so without fear of retribution if they remain within legality?

Where else?

The aggressive tone that protestors have taken seems to lack even the most apologetic of tones. "Yes," they say, "many people died, but the United States is even worse..." Such an either/or perspective is the last thing that this country needs. One-sided thinking, impervious to outside influence, is what filled the heads of the terrorists who attacked New York. Protestors should try to avoid a display of similar one-sided though, especially if they hope to even make a dent on the national approach.

Say what they will about the Bush administration, the President has, against all odds, taken a pragmatic approach to the handling of the situation. No missiles have been errantly fired and no civilians have been killed. His desire for revenge may not sit well with people who think the United States is at fault for these horrible acts, but its certainly understandable. After all, wouldn't the protestors agree that the terrorism itself was a revengeful act, for either perceived or real slights? This might be a vicious cycle, but its not so easy as simply saying it needs to stop.

Whether or not the United States brought this upon itself, the innocent victims of the September 11 attacks most certainly did not. For anyone to callously suggest that they did is insane, insane and immature. Terrorism is never acceptable, whether Osama bin Laden or the United States is involved. Approving one provides proxy approval of the other. The protestors apparently haven't made this connection and that's unfortunate.

Individuals in this country have a freedom to protest against anything that they desire. That is protected by the same American government that was so oft criticized in Saturday's rally. We just wish protestors would think about what the message they are sending when they enjoy that freedom.

Dead Man's Curve, it's no place to play/Dead Man's Curve, you must keep away/Dead Man's Curve, I can hear 'em say:/"Won't come back from Dead Man's Curve" – Jan and Dean

Clear Channel Communications is the largest media provider on the planet.

As the world's largest purveyor of mainstream, mind numbing, incessantly repetitive pop-rock, they, of course, have no soul.

But, caught up in the wave of large companies offering condolences to the victims of the 9-11 attacks, Clear Channel decided to go one better. Knowing the power of music, and how it can affect our thoughts and emotions, Clear Channel, in its infinite wisdom, has decided to protect the delicate sensibilities of their flocks of listeners and ban some songs.

Well, ban is a strong word. It is not a mandate, the company says. Based on the songs lyrical content, they may offend some listeners. The 150 songs contain not violently profane songs as a rule, but a wide assortment of songs.

Ok, so maybe somebody's going to shed some tears over Peter, Paul and Mary's (but interestingly enough, not John Denver's or Chantal Kreviazuk's) "Leaving on a Jet Plane," if they knew somebody that left on a jet plane, never to return.

And I can see how emotions may run high when hearing Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Tuesday's Gone." But can somebody please tell me who's offended by Bobby Darin's oh so cool lounge lizard staple "Mack the Knife?"

Besides all Rage Against the Machine songs- not necessarily a bad idea- the list also contains hair band gods Van Halen with "Jump" and worst song of all time contenders Barry McGuire's "Eve of Destruction" and Yager and Evans' "In the Year 2525."

Several songs by AC/DC, Metallica and Alice in Chains rub elbows with such scandalous tunes as Ricky Nelson's "Travelin' Man."

Yeah, that's right: "When we walked in the sands of the Waikiki/And I held you oh so tight/Oh, I'm a travelin' man/Yes, I'm a travelin' man" is now considered questionable content for radio stations. What really surprises me is that while many of the songs deal with either planes, death or New York, many of the songs seem to be placed on there completely by mistake.

While the world watched Neil Young belt out John Lennon's immortal words in "Imagine" a week or so ago, Clear Channel thinks that this song, too, may upset its listeners. I always liked the ex-Beatle's song, and in light of Lennon's own violent death. It served as an anthem of hope in a crazy world, just like Louie Armstrong's throaty "Wonderful World." Satchmo's ballad, one that almost everyone knows, is a song of a bright future and better things ahead.

Some of Clear Channel's suggestions strike me as blatantly racist. The Bangles' "Walk Like an Egyptian" and the Clash's "Rock the Casbah" are on the list. On a curious side note, "Rock the Casbah" was the first song played by the Armed Forces Radio Network during the Gulf War. Several Cat Stevens songs are on the list. Stevens, a folk singer, became a Muslim in 1977 and is now known as Yusuf Islam. His songs, "Peace Train" and "Morning Has Broken," appear on the list.

Simon And Garfunkel's "Bridge Over Troubled Water"- What? The Happenings' "See You in September"- huh? The Hollies "He Ain't Heavy, He's My Brother"- ok. I know it's sappy, but it's a good tune. Since when did these indispensables of Oldies rotations suddenly become questionable?

And what is Alien Ant Farm going to do? After spending millions- a conservative estimate- on hyping its video, which in turn is driving its album sales, it now finds that their cover of Michael Jackson's "Smooth Criminal" appears on the list, indicted by Clear Channel Communications. U2's brilliant song "Sunday, Bloody Sunday" is there, too. Forget the song is about dealing with a national tragedy. Forget that the song is quite possibly one of the top 50 of all time. It's U2. Clear Channel isn't fit to lick Bono's boots!

It is understandable that some listeners may view certain songs in bad taste during this current tragedy, but you can always just turn the dial- oh wait. No you can't. Clear Channel is the largest radio-broadcasting network on the planet. If they ain't playing a song, ain't nobody playing a song. Well, almost. Clear Channel owns one out of every ten radio stations. They own 94.5 WJMN and 107.9 WXKS in Boston, 96.1 WSRS in Worcester, 93.1 WHYN and 97.9 WPKX- both in Springfield. Just across the border they got four Hartford FM stations, and one in New Haven. And that's not even counting the AM stations they own. So while business is one thing, attempting to gain a monopoly over radio- which seems to be the case in Connecticut- and then blacklisting (or in this case, graylisting) songs is something quite different.

That's not fair business practices. The good people of Connecticut demand their Dave Clark Five, the Tramps, and Paper Lace! ("Bits and Pieces," "Disco Inferno," and "The Night Chicago Died" respectively.)

What's really bad is that three of the most requested songs of all time- Don McLean's "American Pie," Led Zeppelin's "Stairway to Heaven" and Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Free Bird"- are on the list. These are classics. These are rock and roll's version of Beethoven, Mozart and Chopin. It is a crime in and of itself to suggest that the lyrical content of these songs should somehow deem them unplayable.

Music is emotional. It's supposed to affect you, good or bad. Sometimes, we need depressing music. Sometimes, we need nostalgia. And sometimes, every now and then, we need a little Jan and Dean.

WRITE FOR ED/OP

History is disgusted...with US

Another look at our allegiance

AARON LORENZ

"I bet I can make you say blue."

A pause, a child tries to change the subject for a few minutes, talking about the cornbread that was served in today's lunch and the great invention, the spork. "What are the three colors of the American flag?" the young boy asks inquisitively. "Red, white, and blue" replies the unaware third grader.

"I told you I could make you say blue," I respond.

That is the way that Old Glory was instilled into our minds growing up. We remember July 4 and the tune "It's A Grand Old Flag." We recall civics class, social science and high school government. They all taught us what the American flag represents, as a goal, not as a reality. Since September 11, we cannot escape Americans manipulating the flag's goal.

One need not emphasize the horror of the attacks and the repercussions for the families. No emphasis can verbalize the loss that such a public tragedy entails. The pain, we all feel, all human beings. Yet, as with each obstacle in life, it is what we do after the pain slowly subsides that history will write about. As history grabs it pen, it chooses the one of disgust this time.

If one turns on the television, to watch a sporting event, so that entertainment can shortly overshadow the grief, they are bombarded with American flags, "God Bless America," and heartfelt commercial tributes from stations and corporations. It is this that history will view as disgusting. Major League Baseball has decided to put the American flag on the back of each jersey as well on the helmets and hats. The National Football League has done the same on their helmets. These "tributes" are empty and in fact, counterproductive. The NFL and MLB already plus under the auspices of American law. They work within the confines, except Montreal and Toronto, of American economic principles. The World Champions are named as such because of America's ego as well as our ability to finance such sports. When the champions visit the White House, they signify that these sports are part of American culture. On September 10, these teams were no less American than on September 12. The problem is that such coerced forms of nationalism have spilled into the streets of America.

To avoid watching these narcissistic acts of nationalism, one may decide to take a drive, another purely American act. Yet, the red, white, and blue do not escape you. Besides the various towns in the Valley "proudly flying" the flag, lining the streets so that Norman Rockwell's spirit rests well, it is the makeshift "shrines" to America through the flag that history is disgusted by. A Jeep using the flag as cover for its back seat passengers; a car duct taping the flag to its hood; small flags whistling in the wind attached to everyone's antenna. Where were these flags on September 10? Where were these "patriots"

> "...as with each obstacle in life, it is what we do after the pain slowly subsides that history will write about. As history grabs its pen, it choses the one of disgust this time."

when President Bush (George I) draped himself in the flag to implore the American people to back the Gulf Massacre, for his oil rights? The flag seems to come out now out of convenience and this is something that shames us all.

Of course the flag symbolizes something different for each of us. But something has to be normative. In today's modern world, we cannot always be post-modern. The flag has evolved, as we all learned as children, from numerous stars to its present fifty. But the message has remained constant: liberty. That liberty is being co-opted by NBC and ABC as they impose the flag on their corner emblem. It is being co-opted by the media and corporations pledging their support, yet backing their pledge with religion - certainly against liberty as we all recall the separation of church and state. It is being co-opted by the 80 plus percent of Americans who support George II and his "resolve" to attack Afghanistan, and beyond. The flag doesn't symbolize war. It symbolizes liberty.

We live in a country where one has the freedom to travel, freedom of religion, right to free speech and the right to privacy. But all those freedoms come with risks, not costs, but risks. When I travel to California, as I did one week before these attacks, I know that I may encounter injury or death on that trip, but the flag symbolizes my right to do so. When I watch the U.S. Congress "spontaneously" sing "God Bless America" I am reminded that my freedom of religion is dwindling. When I read that radio stations are banning songs that executives deem "objectionable" I am reminded that America is not willing to take risks. It is only a matter of time before a dark skinned American is stopped and searched and charged with possession of a joint because the law enforcement official, well, knows he/she can. Those liberties are fading and the 80 plus percent should use the flags to back that cause.

What makes America so unique is not that we "united" after the tragic events of September 11; any country would do the same if put in our position, and has. America is unique because the very same people who argue for revenge as they wipe tears from their faces waving the flag have those emotions and have those rights because of liberty. The imminent curtailing of civil liberties will haunt the very same people who weep for the victims. History is disgusted at the hate of the attackers as well as the manipulation of those that hide behind the red, white and blue. As I leave the house today, I understand the risk and glance up to my flag blowing in the wind as it has for several years now, and thank it for the liberty it gives me. I hope that liberty lasts.

On finding a job:

Taking the 'don't worry' approach

The gods of employment begin to swoop down on UMass this week, as a year of job fairs kicks off. The School of Management kids have the first crack at this field of jobs and, why not, they have first crack at everything else around this place, so let 'em have it one more time.

I'm not a person who gets worried very often. I keep a pretty even keel and try not to get too rattled by life. Obviously there have been some exceptions lately, but besides that I am pretty much worry-free, even though I will be graduating and haven't begun seriously looking for work yet. Hell, I still need to go out and buy a suit.

"So," you ask, "Brian how is that possible?" Well, I'll tell you concerned reader.

If I were to consider all of the negative factors out there in the job market I would probably heave myself out of my second floor Puffton bedroom window, not killing myself, but causing severe bruising. I know a bunch of people who are really freaking out over getting a job and I can kind of sympathize with them, but at the same time, I can't because it isn't worth it. People worry about the economy, layoffs (which is ironic because you need to have a job before you can get laid off), the crash of the travel industry, a recession occurring, Godzilla burning UMass and flying monkeys attacking innocent people as they sleep.

The only people who have the right to worry are the people who made it through UMass by skidding along on their ass and not doing anything. You folks will only need to memorize one work mantra. "Do you want fries with that?" If you put your time in and did your work and maybe did some extracurricular stuff here, you've done your part. If you have a 2.1 GPA, and did nothing but eat chips and use Instant Messenger, you've got trouble.

On the off chance that one of your parents is going to secure you a job, none of this means a damn thing, and you're lucky, in a way. My dad and grandfather have the family business that puts me here at UMass. Growing up, my dad never offered me a job at the shop. When I was young he'd drag me there on Saturday mornings before the sun rose and the icicles began to drip, but when I'd ask if I could work a couple of days a week, he'd usually say, "we're really not busy enough." So I had to hunt down my own work, and did just about everything. Made pizza, subs, pumped gas, worked at a driving range, racetracks, worked as a maintenance guy, a mechanic, worked in an ice cream freezer for a week at 30 below, worked as a carpet cleaner, at a car wash, and finally as "jo-jo the monkey boy" in the circus.

I think dad probably did me a pretty big favor way back when he told me that he couldn't use me at the shop because I think I have learned more about the world at work than anywhere else.

All of this brings me back to the fact that there is no need to worry about getting a job (unless you are one of the lazy slobs I mentioned before) because you have done it in the past, probably a hundred times like I have. There really isn't much difference in getting a summer job and a "real" job, well besides the clothes. Let's take a look.

At the summer job you fill out an application with references and a job history on it. For a "real" job you send in a resume (application) with references and a job history. At the summer job you had to go talk to the manager or owner of the place and try to make a good impression as an intelligent, trustworthy and honest person. At the "real" job, you go for an interview and talk to the human resources person, and try to make a good impression as an intelligent, trustworthy and honest person. Except that, this time, you dress up.

Lastly, at the summer job they'd usually give you a raise after the first couple of weeks when they knew you were a decent worker and got the job done. At the "real" job they do evaluations and when they show you are a decent worker and you get the job done you usually see some form of compensation for that.

So you perspective job hunters, keep your chin up, your back straight and your smile long. Because being hunkered over that hot grill flipping burgers all day can really make you tired and disappointed.

Broadway's catharsis in the wake of September tragedy

By R. Eric Thomas
Columbia Daily Spectator (Columbia U.)

(U-WIRE) - A terrible thing is happening on Broadway. Ever since the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center towers, New York has not been the same, and every resident of the city has felt furious anguish. The center of balance has been thrown off. Tourism is down dramatically, Times Square looks like a ghost town, and every city business is suffering.

Shows are losing thousands of dollars a day, and the immediate future of the whole industry lies in question. In the wake of the attacks, tourists have shied away from the city, and even those who are here have expressed hesitance or resistance to go see a show. In a time of tragedy such as this it "feels wrong" to enjoy oneself while watching dozens of tap dancers in 42nd Street. Somehow the enjoyment of theater has become perverse.

And it shows. A popular show like Phantom of the Opera usually brings in $60,000 a night at this time of year. Last Monday it brought in $16,662. The next day it was $12,036. Phantom's producer, Cameron Mackintosh, called the situation "an unprecedented crisis."

The argument to stay away from Broadway is strong: how can we take a train that suffers from the collapse of one of its tunnels to a part of the city empty as a wasteland? How can we sit in our seats and watch live performers talk, laugh, sing, and dance while 6,000 or more lie dead in rubble blocks away? How can we be so inhuman?

Theater by nature is a reflector and an interpreter of humanity. Through drama, we understand that which in reality vexes us. We are able to express emotions - the joy of bursting into song, the loneliness of an empty stage - that in the context of our everyday lives have no outlet. Theater is life: its breadth, width, depth, and substance. It is both an honest answer and an escape. Drama is a pulse and a gasp, and like getting up, eating, and resting, it is a staple of everyday life.

The recent award-winning play Wit deals with a cancer patient facing death. Though the context for death is vastly different from terrorist attacks, the emotions and reactions resonate with the same dramatic strength. Similarly, though Into the Woods, coming to Broadway in revival this spring, rests very firmly in a fictional realm, the issues of parental death, single parenthood, and even something as basic as terror are brought up and interpreted. So many children are left without parents, so many homes have been broken; Into the Woods will probably be of little comfort to these living victims, but it helps all of us to understand the weight of the pain thrust upon this city and this nation. It helps us to contextualize the grief and, like counseling, it shows us a way toward resolution.

Anger and outrage are two equally prevalent emotions, two basic tenets of humanity, and the theater is not wont to take them on either. A production of Stephen Sondheim's Assassins - a study of the men who have tried to kill American presidents - has been postponed due to its subject matter, but it is exactly that subject matter that proves its value. Though few want to think about things such as assassination at this time, the existence of Assassins as art shows that theater is able to face the sort of hatred that we are forced to face right now. It proves that we, as humans, can eventually find some sort of understanding.

Now may not feel like the right time to hear Chicago's vengeful anthem "He Had It Coming," but as we begin to rebuild our lives and make sense of the ruins we are left with, we must not forget the theater. Art is the most fragile of disciplines, and the artists on Broadway cannot be abandoned. Theater is therapy, and it is part of all of us. Before we can heal, before we can be whole again, we must look to drama to show us the way.

Douglas and Hopkins top box office

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

A lagging box office got a much-needed boost from two men most comedians would suggest need daily boosts themselves. Don't Say A Word, starring Michael Douglas, and Hearts in Atlantis, starring Anthony Hopkins, were number one and three, respectively, on the box-office charts. Word raked in $18 million over the weekend; Atlantis made $9.5 million.

Word stars Douglas as a psychologist who must get information from a mental patient lest his daughter be killed, also stars Famke Janssen. Don't Say a Word was the biggest debut ever for a movie starring Douglas; his previous best had been A Perfect Murder. Critics seemed indifferent towards the film, saying that it was perfectly acceptable but nothing more.

Keeping the psychological theme alive, Hopkins plays a psychic, this time one on the run who befriends a young boy in a small town. Steven King wrote Atlantis. Its audience was strongly skewed towards female viewers.

Wedging in between Douglas and Hopkins was Zoolander, a Ben Stiller starring vehicle. Telling the story of a male supermodel that must save the world, Zoolander was as critically adored as a movie about an aging supermodel brainwashed to kill the Prime Minister of Malaysia could be. Most seemed to think that movie, while being unbelievably stupid, was entertaining if taken as nothing more than fluff. The movie, which cost $28 million to make, took in $15.7 million and would likely be profitable. Joining Stiller on the runway are Owen Wilson and Stiller's father, Jerry. Numerous other Hollywood personalities make appearances.

The openings were seen as a good sign in Hollywood which had suffering an economic downturn even before the Sept. 11 attacks in New York City and Washington DC. With fewer and fewer quality movies coming out - along with early spring, early fall is a very slow period for big movies - Hollywood had watched profits plunge precipitously. After the attacks, few returned to the movies.

If this weekend was going to be decent, Hollywood was apparently excited for the possibility that next weekend holds. With four new movies opening - Serendipity, with Kate Beckinsale and John Cusack, Training Day, with Denzel Washington and Ethan Hawke, Max Keeble's Big Move, a Disney family film, and Jay Ride, a horror film - insiders are expecting a profitable few weeks. At least by the low standards most have for the autumn season.

Meanwhile, old standbys were still holding on.

Hardball, which stars Keanu Reeves as a down-on-his luck baseball coach in the inner city, earned $5.2 million, falling to number four. It has earned $26.3 million thus far.

The Others, starring Nicole Kidman, continued to earn decent money, slipped to number five but still earned $5.1 million. It has earned almost $80 million to date.

Rounding out the bottom five were Rush Hour 2, The Glass House, Rat Race, The Musketeer, and Two Can Play at That Game. Rush Hour 2 has made more than $200 million this year.

Mariah Carrey's Glitter disappeared completely. Or perhaps, it never appeared. Either way, it was a horrid flop.

Sony monitors internet use by college students

By Laura Krotowski
The Student Life (Washington U St. Louis)

(U-WIRE) ST. LOUIS, Mo. - According to Washington University technology administrators, student download activity is not monitored by the university.

Instead, the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) and the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) are responsible for reporting illegal file sharing, and both monitor student activity as part of their responsibilities.

This past month, however, Sony, not the MPAA or RIAA, became the first group to bring complaints before the university concerning illegal file sharing on campus.

According to Assistant Vice Chancellor of Technology Ian Weller, while "the [WU] network is used to access information on the internet and to provide people with a transport system that connects resources," it is not WU's responsibility to find those who are using the internet to download copyrighted material.

The MPAA and RIAA, however, monitor "peer-to-peer" file sharing tools, such as Napster and Gnutella. They find the IP addresses, internet configuration numbers unique for each user. The first two sets of numbers in all WU IP addresses are the same, so the groups are aware when a user is from the university.

If one of these groups discovered that a WU student had downloaded copyrighted material, they would contact Matt Arthur, assistant director of technology, who shuts down the

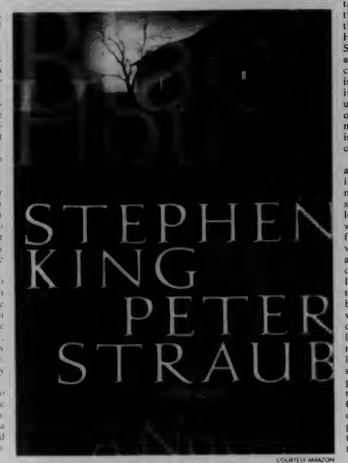
King thrills and chills, again

By Angela Williams
Daily Lobo (U. New Mexico)



(U-WIRE) Once again, master of horror Stephen King takes us to disturbing, yet touching, heights of the human imagination.

Joined by novelist Peter Straub in a fantastic collaborative effort, Black House is a dark fantasy novel for all horror and fantasy fans. The sequel to King's and Straub's The Talisman, Black House embodies everything a good story should:

good guys, bad guys, mystery, love and, of course, horror.

The main character and hero, Jack Sawyer, makes a return from The Talisman into a new plot of suspense. His time a 30-something retired Los Angeles Police Department lieutenant, Sawyer, settles down in French Landing, Wisc., with no recollection of his prior adventures in another dimension. Sawyer wants nothing to do with police work ever again but is slowly sucked into a case against his will.

A murderer who kills and eats children dubbed the Fisherman has run rampant with three victims to his credit, and then snatches Ty Marshall, a very special child with a very special mother. Sawyer begins to work on the case unofficially and eventually uncovers a world that he had forgotten and never wanted to remember.

COURTESY AMAZON

Stephen King and Peter Straub follow up the Talisman with a new vein of horror.

This is one world, which he refers to as the Territories, among many that seem to be on the verge of collapse unless Sawyer can save Ty and bring him back from the clutches of the Fisherman. Otherwise known as creepy elderly Charles Burnside and the demon that is possessing him, Mr. Munshun.

King and Straub offer up a variety of fantastic characters including Ty's mother, Judy Sawyer, the radio multi-personality and spiffy dresser Henry Leydon, the concerned sheriff Dale Gilbertson and the Thunder Five, a group of five wannabe Hell's Angels that have college educations and brew beer.

French Landing seems like an innocuous town in rural Wisconsin, but its ups and downs sometimes verge on the hilarious and sometimes veer toward the very freaky.

Then, of course, the ever-lovable scumbag reporter Wendell Green pops up out of nowhere to make nothing but trouble for Sawyer and the good police force of French Landing.

The black house is something of an interesting phenomenon. It is a gate to other worlds and the headquarters for the Fisherman, who stashes his kids there before brutally mutilating them and eating their body parts. How King and Straub make this animated house the center of the novel is very subtle, since it isn't prominent until toward the end of the novel, but its menacing presence is rampant throughout.

King and Straub also use an interesting third person narrative to tell the story, which literally lets the readers see what's going on from both their viewpoints. They are mostly humorous and watchful. It's a point of view that is used a lot, but it still works within the context of the novel. They lighten when the mood threatens to be lightened, but take a step back when the plot and characters need to take over. Overall, it's a point of view that is used properly and adds to the story, rather than detracts.

Anyone who is a fan of King or Straub or in the mood for a little fantastical intrigue should pick up a copy of Black House and be ready to go for an engrossing ride that doesn't end until the last page is read.

user's internet access.

"The first offense is an educational issue," said Weller. The administration will not punish students who did not realize that downloading copyrighted material is illegal. If the students remove the items in question from their computers, Network Technology Services will restart their internet services.

"The first time you get caught sharing stuff is just a big inconveniencing slap on the wrist," explained junior Brandon Woo, who was caught sharing movies last year.

However, the second offense brings a student before the judicial board. Students are not commonly caught obtaining illegal material. Incidents occur about once per month.

According to Weller, there has been a significant increase in the amount of WU network activity over the past few years. This is true for schools across the U.S. The increase in internet traffic by students is tied to acquiring MP3's and video files, making it difficult for network administrators to manage activity. However, the number of complaints from the MPAA and RIAA have not increased.

"In the highway available to us, you get a lane," explained Weller. "There is only a finite amount of bandwidth that we provide to you. We want to make sure that you can send email and make sure that there's space available to do so. We provide access for educational purposes, not solely for entertainment. We need a balance between the two."

Though WU does not monitor the network itself, the university does keep track of the activity going on with regard to bandwidth and how people are using the internet.

"We prefer you to self-manage than to have us manage," said Weller. Additionally, the university does not monitor Web sites with an eye peeled for inappropriate or illegal material.

Upon encountering potentially objectionable material, "We look at whether it interferes with the University's mission," Weller explained. "Whether or not something is pornographic is subjective."

Kerry Ann Jaggassar's (No. 17) injury in the third game of the season changed the UMass defense from a strength to a liability.

■ defense

and White finished the season as the nation's top ranked defense, giving up a mere 0.74 goals a game.

Unfortunately for head coach Patty Shea and the rest of her squad, this year's team has been a different story. Over the first seven contests of the season, UMass has already given up a total of 23 scores, including three of those in Saturday's 3-1 loss to UConn.

Last year, the Minutewomen gave up 18 goals the entire year.

"We knew we would be scored on this year, but we have also scored more goals than we had last year at this point," Shea said. "Teams are putting goals in on us, but we are putting them right back."

Despite Shea's optimism, some things are definitely amiss for the Maroon and White, as it has struggled to a 2-5 record. Because the offense has played solidly thus far, the brunt of the blame must fall on a defense that was so staunch only a season ago.

"You have to take chances and go and attack," Shea said. "There are sections of the field where you should take 100 percent risk and other sections where you should take 0 percent risk. At times we have been caught taking risks in areas we shouldn't be."

Though proper risk taking has been some of the problem, the most notable difference between this year and last has been something that nobody can do anything about, the loss of second team All-American goalie, Tucker.

And although sophomore Ashley Egland has filled in admirably, she has had some rough outings, giving up four or more goals more than half of the times she has patrolled the UMass net.

In addition, although the defensive core from last season has remained largely in place, it has not been the mold of consistency that it once was. Bruemmer, who Shea had called the best defender in the country, has been called on to carry more of the offensive load, and while she has done this (seven goals), it has been at the expense of some of her defensive responsibilities. After all, she can't be everywhere at once.

This would have left more of the responsibility in the backfield on laggassar, but in the third game of the season, she went down with an injury against Boston College and has not played or practiced since. Suddenly, what was once a known strength turned into a giant question mark, and at times, this inexperience has been costly.

Against UConn, with the game still very much in reach, the Minutewomen failed to get back in position and watched as a crosscourt pass by Lauren Henderson was deflected by Kelly Stolle over the shoulder of Egland for the score. This made the score 3-1, and for all intents and purposes, clinched the win for the Huskies.

"We had a break down on recovery defense," Shea said. "We were ball watching and they took advantage of it with a great deflection."

Despite its record, however, UMass has shown occasional bright spots. Against the Huskies, the offense was aggressive and constantly pressured the opposing defense. The freshman played like veterans, most notably Heather Kenney, Ashley Gilbert and Adrianne Monaco and defensive lapses seemed to be fewer and farther between.

Shea especially liked what she saw.

"It was the best game we played all season," the fifth year coach said. "We passed and moved the ball well, gave some great give and go's, and stayed to the game plan. You always hate to lose to UConn, but we are ready to put it on the line again. Every game we have gotten significantly better."

Saturday's "moral victory" also reminded Shea of a loss her team had three years ago to Boston University, which ended up being the turning point of the season.

"The result was a loss on the scoreboard, but it was the best moral victory," Shea said. "From that point on we [nearly] swept the rest of the season."

It still remains to be seen whether the UConn game has a similar effect.

her team's fourth penalty corner.

An already physical game got downright chippy over the remainder of the first half, starting when UConn's Megan Ware took a penalty corner blast to the midsection from UMass sweeper Anke Bruemmer. Less than a minute later, the Husky captain robbed UMass of a prime scoring chance by hip-checking Gilbert to the turf on a breakaway.

Ware was slapped with a green card on the play, though the senior was anything but remorseful of her tackle.

"Whatever - she just tripped," Ware said of the play in question. "But when you're a physical player like I am, you're going to get calls against you."

Even Shea downplayed the rough-and-tumble nature of the game, attributing it to the intensity of both the rivalry and field hockey itself.

"They may have skirts on, but it's definitely a contact sport," Shea said. "And it's UMass-UConn, so it's going to get physical."

The Huskies closed out scoring with a nifty play 7:39 into the second half. Freshman Lauren Henderson threaded a pass across the UMass zone to junior Kelly Stolle, whose tip shot lofted up over a surprised Egland and into the Minutewoman net.

"We were caught ball watching, and they took advantage of the seam that we gave them," Shea said. "It was a great tip."

UMass was kept off the board down the stretch largely by Ware, who single-handedly shut down two consecutive Maroon and White penalty corners around the 5:00 mark. She first stuffed Bruemmer on a straight shot, then swooped in for a clean steal on a delay play to Gilbert.

As the lone returning senior from last season's Elite Eight squad, Ware was fueled largely by memories of last year's 2-1 road loss to the Minutewomen.

"We just wanted to do what last year's team couldn't, and that's beat UMass," Ware said.

The Maroon and White returns to action on Wednesday night, when it hits the road for a 7:00 p.m. battle with Boston University.

"She still doesn't know how good she is and we're trying to convince her everyday," said Rudy. "She's got a great total package and she works at it. I'm so glad she's here."

Just nine minutes later the game was out of reach as Erin Lilly pounced on a loose ball inside the UNH box and fired home to make the score 3-0. Midfielders Jones, Machamer and Martha Conover all played important roles in the goals buildup, but in typical fashion, it was the striker Lilly who ended up with the last and decisive touch.

The match digressed much from that point on as both coaches went to their benches to give the reserves some necessary time to impress. One reserve who definitely did impress was sophomore goalkeeper Kelly Nigh. Nigh, the understudy to Podhrasky, got the chance to start and did not let her team down by registering the first shutout of the year for UMass.

"We give our number two [goalie] quality games so they're not 5-0 and nothing-to-do type of games," said Rudy. "She'll get more games because she's training good and she's a quality goalkeeper. We're all very confident in her."

The Minutewomen return to action tomorrow afternoon when they travel to Harvard for their first road game of the season in yet another midweek match.

momentum, the Pride "D" dealt another crushing blow. On two consecutive trips inside the 20-yard line, Hofstra's defense dug in and held the Minutemen to two field goals and its only two scores of the contest.

On the first play of the second quarter Robinson recovered a fumble on the Hofstra 22-yard line. But, in what has become a season theme, the offense could not capitalize on a defensive gem.

"The offense just didn't give the defense any help at all," Whipple said.

On its next possession the UMass "O" put together its best drive of the day (12 plays, 56 yards) only to flame out at the Hofstra 18-yard line, leading to another field goal.

"Two field goals weren't going to get it done, everybody knew that," Whipple said.

For maybe the third time this year, DeShon Hardy was the lone bright spot on the offensive side of the ball for the Minutemen. The senior wideout (27 all last year) grabbed five balls for 60 yards, giving him 20 receptions on the year.

With the disheartening defeat, UMass starts the season with four straight losses for the first time since its October 19 loss to Rhode Island in 1957. So far this season UMass (4) points is the illegitimate child of an offensively gifted conference.

Any of the supposed experts who have spewed the "defense wins championships" cliche for years must be eating their collective words right now. Because in Amherst, the defense isn't going to win squat until the "O" is present and accounted for.

passes for 600 yards and eight scores and before Saturday, the senior lead the conference in receiving yards per game with 144. Adams, a junior, has snared 25 tosses for 435 yards and five touchdowns. Both are averaging over 18.8 yards per catch.

"I don't know how you could pick one over the other," said Gardi, former New York Jets assistant coach from 1976-1984, when asked who he thought may be his primary receiver.

"It reminds me of when I coached Joe Klecko and Mark Gastineau. When one got a sack, the other got two. It's great competition."

Gastineau and Klecko are the first two names on the Jets' all-time career sack leaders list. Both part of the "New York Sack Exchange," the two combined for 185 sacks in their careers.

Although Gardi's newest duo isn't nearly as renowned as the Gastineau-Klecko combination. The Pride's receiving duet is the reason why Hofstra has the No. 1 rated offense in the A-10. The two respect each other and feed off each other's successes. And matched with Butler's throwing arm, their resolve will only make them better.

"I don't think we're fighting for each ball," said Adams, who Saturday became the fourth player in Hofstra history to record 2,000 receiving yards.

"Of course, if Kahmal scores a couple touchdowns then I want to score a couple too. That's just in our competitive nature."

The midfield play of Kat Machamer (No. 11) helped UMass to its first shutout of the season.

Minutewomen win third straight

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Heading into last Friday's match with the University of New Hampshire, Jim Rudy, the head coach of the Massachusetts women's soccer team was nervous.

His team had played just one weekday game all season and had been soundly beaten 5-0 by Connecticut that day. But he seemed to be the only one worried about the squad's weekday struggles because, in the words of goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky, "it was already the weekend."

The Minutewomen picked up their third consecutive victory, weekend or not, as they knocked off the Wildcats 3-0 on Friday afternoon. Sophomore Michelle Luttati keyed the win by tallying a pair of goals for the Maroon and White, one on either side of halftime. Fellow sophomore Erin Lilly added her second goal of the season in the 64th minute to round out the scoring.

Just six minutes into the match Luttati provided what would prove to be the game-winning goal off a cross from Lilly. Senior midfielder Katelyn Jones played the first of the Minutewomen's season high nine corners short to Lilly who turned the ball and unleashed a pinpoint cross that found Luttati alone at the back post. Her header eventually found its way into the Wildcat net following a pair of deflections to put UMass in front 1-0.

"We really worked on our restarts and our serving," said Rudy. "We went through the whole thing the other day, short corner, turn, serve [to the] back post because everybody is going to shift toward the short corner, it was textbook stuff."

UNH was unable to create much offense prior to the opening strike and continued to be frustrated by the UMass back line following it. Leading Wildcat scorer Ana Tobon was given little or no space all afternoon by the Minutewoman defense, which allowed just six shots all match.

"We had a priority to play really good defense today," Rudy said. "The last few games we've been really suspect at letting things up out of the blue. We wanted to minimize the number of chances we give up."

While the Wildcats struggled to find holes in the UMass defense, the Maroon and White had no such problems at the other end of the pitch and were unlucky to go into halftime up by just a single goal.

Senior center midfielder Kat Machamer nearly opened her 2001 scoring account in the 44th minute when she beat two UNH defenders on a mazy run before firing a low left-footed shot that caromed off the far post and away from danger. Just a minute later, Lilly had her appeal for a penalty waved away after she was obstructed and felled in the box by Wildcat defender Amber Radzevich.

The second half was more of the same as the Minutewomen continued to dominate at both ends of the pitch. Starting forwards Lilly and Stephanie Santos were left on the bench as play resumed with Rudy preferring freshman Erica Wideberg and senior Brooke Bartlett. The move to go with Bartlett would pay off just eight minutes in as she helped to win a controversial corner for her squad. The referee's assistant on the right side of the pitch originally called for a goal kick only to be overruled by the head official, much to the chagrin of UNH coach Michael Jackson.

Bartlett proceeded to take the ensuing corner and found Luttati again at the back post. Luttati dispatched a looping header that found its way over the outstretched hand of Wildcat goalkeeper Kristen Oullette and under the crossbar to double the UMass lead at 2-0. The goal was Luttati's third in the last two games and third of her

Gridiron woes continue

Pride controls UMass on both sides of field

By Matthew F. Sacco

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. – If the Hofstra offense can smell the endzone, then Massachusetts has a bad case of nasal congestion.

Pride QB Rocky Butler and his fatal flanker duo of Charlie Adams and Kahmal Roy reeled off five touchdowns in a 36-6 rout that saw the Minutemen fail to reach paydirt for the tenth straight quarter.

UMass	6

"We got the ball in the redzone a couple times," UMass coach Mark Whipple said. "But the offense just didn't do what it was supposed to do. [QB] Matt [Guice] has to make more plays."

Whipple's offense, with a redshirt freshman at the helm, was anemic for the fourth straight game, all losses.

But while the UMass offense is still struggling to find itself, the Hofstra offense sits on a sturdy foundation of speed and depth. If Butler doesn't beat you with his legs, he'll beat you with his arm. If Adams doesn't light up the scoreboard, then Roy will gladly fill in. It was a case of "pick your poison" for the Minutemen, as the Pride [3-1, 3-1 Atlantic-10] roster was teeming with playmakers on Saturday.

"Those guys [Roy and Adams] are good, the slot [receivers] are good, too, that just compliments their game," senior safety Jeremy Robinson said. "They have a great quarterback, too. It's kind of frustrating out there when they have talent like that on offense."

With under a minute remaining in the first half, Butler (22-36, 382 yards) found Adams streaking down the left sideline for a 43 yard score that all but put the game away, as the Pride held a 22-6 lead.

Butler hit Adams and Roy 18 times for over 350 yards and three touchdowns. The twin burners were simply too much to handle for the UMass secondary, as two of Adams' three scores were of the 40 yard variety, both created by his sub-4.4 speed.

Not to be outdone, the previously maligned Hofstra defense built a stronghold in front of its endzone allowing only two field goals, while forcing a safety in the games opening quarter.

"I think we finally got our defense together," Hofstra coach Joe Gardi said. "I thought we swarmed well and we didn't give up any big plays."

With only 240 total yards allowed, it's a wonder that the Pride defense allowed any plays at all.

Guice managed only 177 yards and 2 INT's through the air, while the power and speed duo of Omari Howard and Kevin Quinlan combined for a paltry 69 yards rushing.

Stopping the run was certainly a key for Gardi's squad, especially with a whippersnapper behind center for the Maroon and White.

"We really controlled the line of scrimmage up front," Gardi said. "I think they wanted to run the ball because of their young quarterback, but we took the run game away."

The Maroon and White managed to kick just two field goals against A-10 rival Hofstra Saturday, its only points of the contest.

Hofstra WR's impress all in 30-point rout

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. – Kahmal Roy will not waver to tell you that he is fond of his fellow wideout.

"I'm a Charlie Adams fan," said Roy after his Hofstra Pride beat the Massachusetts football team, 36-6 Saturday evening. "I'll be the first one to say it."

In fact, Adams received many respects Saturday after catching eight passes for a career-high 163 yards (including three touchdowns).

But he wasn't singled out. Roy's ten-reception, 168-yard performance in the Minuteman dismantling was also worthy of some esteem.

"They're two of the best receivers I've ever faced," said Jeremy Robinson, the Minutemen's All-American defensive back. "You can't say anything bad about them. Those guys are good. "All three of us [came into this league] together, and from freshman year on, they just got better and better and better."

Together, Adams and Roy took the UMass defense to pieces. At first, it seemed as though the Maroon and White might have had a handle on the duo, with successful aerial stands from Robinson and freshman Leroy Brooks in the UMass backfield.

But it did not last long. Near the end of the first quarter, Hofstra's Rocky Butler found Adams three times in just over one minute, the final toss resulting in a Pride touchdown and 9-3 Hofstra advantage. That lead extended to 22-6 with just under 30 seconds left in the first half when Butler, Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of The Week for the second straight week, found Adams speeding past sophomore Rob Williams for a 43-yard scoring scamper.

"I think…Kahmal and Charlie put on one heck of a show," Hofstra coach Joe Gardi said. "It's just unbelievable what type of big play people they are. I think we demoralize defenses with big plays and it's because of these guys and their second and third efforts."

"We were young going in, and we got younger coming out," said UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple, seemingly deflated from the prior 60 minutes. "We need this off-week, that's for sure."

After a UMass punt to begin the third quarter, The Pride started the ensuing drive at its own 19-yard line but needed only three plays to waltz into Six Town. A seven-yard toss to Adams began the drive, and a 34-yard Roy over-the-top reception set up Butler's 40-yard scoring route on the next play.

"It's like playing playground football," said Butler, who talked about the fun involved with having two NFL prospects on the flanks. "Whoever is open is going to get the ball."

In four games, Roy has caught 31

STORRS, Conn.– Security at the University of Connecticut was given the ultimate test on Saturday, when a wily perpetrator tried to sneak a dog into the spectator area of the George J. Sherman Family Sports Complex.

UConn	3

Unfortunately for the visiting Massachusetts field hockey team, it was the dogs on the field that couldn't be contained.

The No. 19 Huskies broke an early 1-1 deadlock with two unanswered goals on their way to a 3-1 win over the Minutewomen. Despite a career-high 10 saves from sophomore goalkeeper Ashley Egland, UMass dropped to 2-5 on the season while UConn righted its record at 4-4.

"The bottom line is that you hate to lose to UConn, but this was the best game we've played all year," said UMass head coach Patty Shea. "It may have been a loss on the scoreboard, but it was the best moral victory we could have had."

The game looked to be a shootout in the early goings, as the Huskies needed a mere 3:38 to draw first blood. UConn midfielder Lauren Christie snuck in from the left side and put back a loose ball off her team's second penalty corner to stake the Huskies to a 1-0 advantage.

The Minutewomen didn't need long to come up with an answer, however, as junior forward Erika Whiston put home the equalizer on her team's ensuing possession.

The play was keyed by freshman Ashley Gilbert, who stole a pass-back and forced UConn keeper Maureen Butler to commit before dishing to Whiston and earning her second career assist.

UConn head coach Nancy Stevens chalked the goal up to her team's lone mental lapse of the afternoon.

"We only made one really bad defensive mistake all day, and that was it," Stevens said. "Instead of moving the ball down the field, we passed it right back into our end and let them get an easy goal."

The tie stood up until the 15:54 mark, when Husky Amy Marland socked home the go-ahead goal after an excruciatingly long delay play off

STORRS, Conn. – Last year it would have been shocking. The Massachusetts field hockey team just did not give up that many goals. In fact, over a 10 game span in October and November, the Minutewomen gave up three goals total, winning all 10 while they marched to the Elite Eight of the NCAA field hockey tournament.

With arguably the best netkeeper in the country in Zowie Tucker, and with experienced and effective backs in Jill Fantasia, Anke Bruemmer and Kerry Ann Jaggassar, the Maroon

Annual Fall Foliage Walk to turn a profit for charity

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

The 30th annual Fall Foliage Walk will be taking place on Saturday, October 13, from 8:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. The Walk begins at Amherst's Mill River Recreation Area and stretches 20 kilometers (14 miles) to end at South Amherst Common.

The Walk is a charity benefit for the Amherst Committee for a Better Chance, Inc. or Amherst ABC. Amherst ABC is a nonprofit, community-sponsored organization that brings academically talented students of color from educationally disadvantaged areas to Amherst to attend Amherst Regional High School. The Walk is the big annual fundraiser for the organization and hopes to draw many walkers and supporters.

The program has been in operation for over 30 years and has many connections to the University of Massachusetts. Currently there are two Amherst ABC alumni pursuing degrees at UMass.

Qasim LaRoche is a sophomore electrical engineering major who came to Amherst from New York City. He is also on the Amherst ABC board of directors and serves as a liaison between the board and other ABC alumni in different areas.

"The [ABC] program is pretty great. When I first came here, the standard classes were like honors classes," LaRoche said. "The teachers liked teaching. That helped me a lot at UMass. I took what I learned from ABC and from what I learned from my parents and actually did pretty good. I got into the School of Engineering."

ABC is a national program involving 24 public and 168 independent schools. Community activists who wanted to provide immediate help for talented students who otherwise might not have had access to a college preparatory education founded it in 1968.

Amherst ABC now operates by a 30 member volunteer Board of Directors, and eight host families. The board of directors includes LaRoche and W.E.B. DuBois Library communication specialist, Emily Silverman.

Students who join the Amherst program are selected from a group that is first identified by the national ABC offices in Boston. There are usually eight to 10 students who arrive in Amherst and live at the Amherst ABC house at 74 North Prospect Street. A bank donated the house 32 years ago.

The students spend one weekend per month in the house of a host family. Resident directors Irasema and Bryant Lewis, who share the ABC house with their three children, provide a structured and warm home environment for the students.

The program is funded by local residents, businesses, religious and civic groups in addition to the donations received from the walk. The Hampshire Community United Way is also a sponsor of the program. Though major foundations support the national ABC, Amherst ABC is completely dependent on local contributions. Funds generated by the Walk are critical to maintaining the Amherst ABC annual operating budget.

"There have been houses in other parts of Massachusetts that have been shut down because they haven't had enough community support," LaRoche said.

In January, Amherst ABC began its first capital campaign. The campaign has two goals: to build an endowment fund and to renovate the ABC house, an expansive Victorian residence built in the late 1800's.

"Money from the Walk will go to keeping the house going," LaRoche said. "It's a big source of income that goes to the upkeep [of the house], tutors and food. A lot of the stuff has been donated, too. The recreation room has a pool table that was donated by a nursing home."

This year, organizers are encouraging participants to be creative, as a way to mark the walk as a milestone. Some groups are planning to walk together, such as the fourth and fifth grade girl's soccer teams and the Sage team at the Amherst Regional Middle School. There is also a group of Amherst College Students that serve as ABC tutors who will be walking. Some are even running the route.

Walkers are hoping to obtain pledges in increments of $30 in honor of the 30th anniversary of the walk. Pledge cards can be received in advance at the Jones Library. On Saturday, participants can register at the Mill River Recreation Area from 8:00 a.m. to 10:00 a.m., or at Amethyst Brook from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. There will be eight checkpoints along the route offering water, snacks and also available drivers to return walkers to their cars.

Contributions to the ABC Annual Fall Foliage Walk may be sent to: Amherst ABC, Box 1922, Station 2, Amherst, MA, 01002. For more information or to make a pledge, contact Jayne Lovett at jelovett@amherst.edu, or check out www.abetterchance.org.

Michael Shrifier lectured on terrorism at Amherst College yesterday.

Lecture warns not to overlook terrorism in this hemisphere

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

In the days following the attacks on the World Trade Center, most discussion of American foreign policy has focused on Central Asia and the Middle East. Michael Shifter, the Vice President of the foreign affairs forum Policy for Inter-American Dialogue, worries that US relations with Colombia, a recent hotbed of guerilla violence, will be neglected.

Shifter delivered a lecture yesterday, "Colombia and the New War on Terrorism: Where Do We Go From Here?" at Amherst College's Converse Hall. The lecture was part of the Amherst College Political Science department's lectures series, "Latin America and Globalization."

Shifter began by explaining that, at the time of the September 11 attacks, Secretary of State Colin Powell was in Peru, about to embark on a diplomatic trip to Bogota, Colombia.

"It's useful to think about what he might have seen," Shifter said. "He wouldn't see ethnic and religious conflict like one sees in many parts of the world. He would have encountered violence under a different set of circumstances – an insurgency not seen in Colombia in four decades, and paramilitary forces that have emerged because of a weak state that is unable to protect its citizens."

Shifter described the problems seen in the violence-torn country. "Colombia has 70 percent of the kidnappings in the world – 3,000 last year," he said. "It is home to a huge number of displaced people – 2 million out of a population of 40 million. It also has an unemployment rate of 20 percent, one of the highest in Latin America."

Today, the enormous amount of drugs being grown in Colombia has led to the rise of anti-government paramilitary groups, which in many cases resort to terrorism. On September 10, the day before the World Trade Center attacks, the US State Department officially declared the Colombian National Liberation Army, a paramilitary group, a terrorist organization. It joins the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia on the State Department's list of recognized terrorist groups.

American foreign policy has focused mainly on eradicating the trade of drugs. Much of America's foreign aid to Colombia has gone to its military, which has vowed to stamp out coca production. However, due to recent evidence linking the Colombian military with human rights violations, many have expressed doubts about this course of action.

"There is a measure before Congress now called the Andean Regulation Initiative," said Shifter. "If passed, $800 million will go to Colombia and surrounding countries. Many people now are wondering, 'why should we give Colombia more money when it doesn't appear that the money we have given has done any good?'

"There are three major questions in my mind," he said. "The first question – the obvious one – is about drugs. If we're spending money to eradicate coca, but the price of drugs hasn't gone up, then why do we continue to go down this road? The second question is about human rights. If paramilitary groups have links to the military, and we give to the military, aren't we contributing to tremendous human rights violations? And finally, won't this drag the US into a mess, similar to what happened in Vietnam?"

Shifter said that, despite many reservations, he was willing to support attempts by the US to back the Colombian military.

"It's a complicated situation that the US doesn't know how to respond to," he said. "The problem is that the state cannot protect its citizens. We have to help those whose job it is to protect them."

This stance proved unpopular with some of the lecture's attendees. Farid Benavides, a graduate student in Political Science at the University of Massachusetts, was among those that disagreed.

"When one looks at the pressure for Peru to fight against drugs, one sees human rights violations," Benavides said. "In Colombia, you see the same thing…aren't we impeding Colombian democracy?"

Shifter responded that he shared some of Benavides' concerns, but felt that the ultimate problems in Colombia lie outside of US intervention.

"If the US were to decide to withdraw from Colombia, I don't think one comes out with a happy picture," he said. "The problem is still there even if you remove the US."

Shifter stressed that he felt that the ultimate solution would come from a combination of military and political means.

"I think there has to be a political agreement that is realistic," he said. "There are doubts in my mind that there's an agreement that will make everyone happy, but that's what the government has to aim for."

KSU finding the secret to better suds

By Betsy Stverak
Kansas State Collegian (Kansas State U.)

(U-WIRE) MANHATTAN, Kan. – People all over are putting down the store-bought beer and concocting their own beer formulas.

A hobby that seems to be growing by the minute is home-brewed beer. Doug Jardine, Kansas State University professor of plant pathology, said he began brewing his own beer for many reasons.

"Generally, the taste is much better than the common beers," he said. "It's cheaper than buying micro-beers or imported beers."

Jardine is the secretary of a Manhattan home brewing club called "The Little Apple Brew Crew." Jardine said he has been part of the club for seven years and joined the club purely out of curiosity.

"I got interested when I tried it at a friend's house, and I liked it," he said. "I then went out and boughts supplies and joined the club."

Jardine said the club meets every third Monday of the month, and the meetings consist of relaxation and drinking a cold one.

"The meetings are dedicated to sampling different beers each club member has made," he said. "We share tips and techniques."

Another beer lover who participates in home brewing is Walter Dodds. Dodds, associate professor of biology and member of the Brew Crew, said that at the club meetings, the brewers occasionally focus on brewing a certain type of beer.

"We usually have a style brew for the month," he said. "It can range anywhere from stout and honey-wheat to lagers and pale ale."

Dodds said the club has competed before.

"We have an annual club brewing session," he said. "We submit the brews to club-only competitions."

Although the brewing process can seem lengthy, Dodds said there is a basic process.

First, spend about four hours preparing the ingredients, which typically include malt extract, water, hops and yeast, he said. Next, seal it up and let it sit for three weeks. Then transfer it into bottles, where it stays for two weeks before it is ready.

Dodds said there are important factors to remember when brewing.

"Keep it clean and sanitary," he said. "It keeps good flavors in the brew."

Another member of the Brew Crew, Marc Rehfuss, graduate student in microbiology, said he joined the club simply because he wanted to see others' reactions.

"I wanted other people to taste my beer and give me feedback," he said. "Producing the product is a very gratifying experience."

Rehfuss said that when brewing, he has favorites.

"One style that I love brewing is India Pale Ale. It's fairly easy to do and has great hops and aroma," he said. "It doesn't take long to age, and it's enjoyable to drink."

Rehfuss said there is a general rule of thumb when brewing.

"The stronger the beer, the longer it takes to age," he said.

The love of brewing beer reached out past Manhattan. Brian Bird of Kansas City said he discovered his hobby by receiving a present.

"I got a beer kit, and it immediately sparked my interest," he said. Bird said he has been brewing for over a year.

"I brew on an average of once a month," he said. "I have a kit set-up so I can brew a couple batches, types and flavors at the same time."

Bird said even though he brews many types of beers, he generally sticks to brewing with the same characteristics.

"I mainly like darker beers," he said, "with flavor, body and texture. A little bit heavier of a beer."

Although this is just a hobby now, Bird said he plans to go public with it in the future.

"I hope to attend a brewery school - Sibel Institute in Chicago," he said. "I hope to eventually pursue this as a career."

With brewing being a timely and patient process, Rehfuss said the results are worth it.

"The most satisfying part of home brewing is formulating the recipe, brewing it and enjoying it," he said. "Drinking a product that you produced yourself."

Oregon

By Eric Martin
Oregon Daily Emerald (U. Oregon)

EUGENE, Ore. – University of Oregon senate leaders have been critical of excessive spending on intercollegiate athletics in the past, but they welcome Nike CEO Phil Knight's pocket-book gift with open coffers.

Members of the senate, the sole governing body for the University, said Friday that Knight's unspecified contribution could indirectly bolster University teacher salaries. Faculty salaries are 12.5 percent lower than those at comparable universities, according to a Senate Budget Committee report.

"The stadium expansion will be able to go ahead, which will allow the Athletic Department to become self-sufficient," said Nathan Tublitz, biology professor and president of the University Senate. "And because subsidy funds are no longer being used by intercollegiate athletics, they can be used to support faculty salaries."

In the past, intercollegiate athletics has drawn $2 million each year from the University general fund - a cookie jar that many departments count on - to pay for athletes' tuition and other academic endeavors. But last spring, the Faculty Advisory Council, which is composed of 10 elected faculty, suggested the senate incrementally reduce the subsidy over four years and eliminate it by 2005.

"Basically, the Athletic Department agreed to reduce that $2 million over a four-year period," said Tom Larson, director of finance and contracts for intercollegiate athletics. "Without replacement revenue, that would mean some major cuts in programs we have."

Nebraska

By Charlie Kauffman
Daily Nebraskan (U. Nebraska)

LINCOLN, Neb. - Say the alphabet backwards. Stand on one leg. Breathe in the tube. Get in the car.

U.S. police pull over countless suspected drunken drivers daily and make arrests for driving while intoxicated.

They often determine how drunk the driver is using breath analysis.

The test, commonly known as a Breathalyzer, is actually an Intoxilyzer, the brand name of the device police now use.

Ted Koperski, manager of Nebraska's breath-testing machines, said Breathalyzer is the brand name of the very first breath analysis machine, released in 1953.

Infrared analysis, currently the most widely used method of breath testing, began in the early 1980s, Koperski said. After the initial physical sobriety tests, police employ a preliminary breath test to determine the source of the impairment.

Koperski said driving impairments could be caused by alcohol, head injuries, fatigue or a number of other factors.

"The reason they use (preliminary breath tests) is to determine whether or not the impairment observed is caused by alcohol," Koperski said.

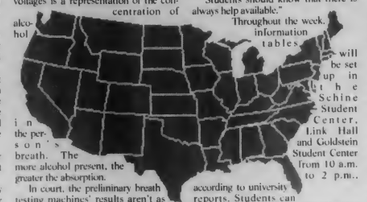
Koperski said the preliminary testing machines use a platinum and carbon chemical catalyst to break down the alcohol in a driver's breath and generate an electrical current. The more alcohol present in the breath, the stronger the current.

The catalyst regenerates itself after each use and is ready for another test after about five minutes, Koperski said.

The preliminary test is especially valuable for instances where a driver might have a high tolerance for alcohol and is able to pass the physical sobriety tests, Koperski said.

The preliminary test can be used to determine the approximate level of intoxication and helps police to decide if the driver should be taken elsewhere for another test.

University of Nebraska and Lincoln, Neb., police take suspected drunk drivers to Cornhusker Place Detox for further testing.



The officer decides on a case-by-case basis whether to arrest the driver, a decision based on field physical and breath sobriety tests.

Once an arrest has been made, police take the suspected drunk driver to the station or detox center to administer an infrared absorption analysis. This test is performed using an Intoxilyzer device, manufactured by Owensboro, Ky.-based CMI.

CMI's Web site described the end result of the test, the concentration of alcohol in a person's breath, as the difference of two voltages from a test with alcohol and a test without.

"When (infrared) light of a particular frequency passing through a chamber with no alcohol present strikes a detector, a certain voltage level is created," CMI stated on its Web site. "As the alcohol level in (the) chamber increases, the amount of light able to pass through the chamber and strike the detector decreases."

The new level of infrared light causes a new voltage, and the difference in the voltages is a representation of the concentration of alcohol in the person's breath. The more alcohol present, the greater the absorption.

In court, the preliminary breath testing machines' results aren't as credible as those of the infrared test.

"The courts say (the preliminary test results) are good for probable cause," Koperski said.

The infrared tests are far more accurate when administered properly, he said.

"The proven reliability of the (infrared) instrument has been pretty well established," he said.

SYRACUSE, N.Y. - Students who read the Syracuse University Safety and Security booklet will learn that the school does "not tolerate sexual assault or sexual harassment in any form."

Despite this, 23 reported forcible sex offenses were committed on campus and three additional at fraternities or sororities in 2000, said Wesley Bird, associate director of the Department of Public Safety.

"That's sick," said Rachel Roy, a freshman voice performance major. "Out of the thousands here on campus, 23 doesn't seem like a lot of people, but one rape is too many."

The university has responded with Rape Awareness Week. Starting Monday, the SU R.A.P.E. Center has several events planned to promote the cause.

"Awareness is very important," said SU spokesman Kevin Morrow.

Students should know that there is always help available."

According to university reports, Students can talk to R.A.P.E. Center representatives and view T-shirts painted by survivors, the report added.

On Oct. 3, survivors of rape, sexual assault, incest and other forms of violence will have the opportunity to paint T-shirts in the Hall of Languages at 7 p.m. The same day, in Link Hall, students can paint messages on banners to protest violence against women, the report stated.

"I don't see how a week of painting T-shirts can make up for the fact that so many people are raped on this campus," said Sheila Hamilton, a freshman public relations major.

Hawaii

HONOLULU – People who were laid off after Sept. 11 may now have the opportunity to attend the University of Hawaii tuition-free.

Governor Ben Cayetano, joined by Hawaii's top leaders in business and government, announced immediate efforts that the state and private sector are taking to deal with economic concerns in the wake of terrorist attacks.

Among many of the recommendations for dealing with the short-term and long-term economic concerns in the state of Hawaii, the University of Hawaii may be used as a tool to help boost the economy by offering tuition waivers to people who have lost their jobs.

Gov. Cayetano's press secretary, Kim Murakawa, said that Cayetano is in favor of the plan if the university can afford it. He welcomes the plan saying that the waivers will give unemployed workers more options, and the opportunity to be retrained for another job.

UH President Evan Dobelle and other administrative officials are working so that people who have been laid off after Sept. 11, could receive a tuition waiver to attend UH.

"The benefit as a public institution is to assert moral authority in difficult times and provide a safety net and possible springboard for our fellow Hawaiians," Dobelle wrote in an e-mail.

"The benefit, I trust, will be to give short-term help and hope. It is beneficial for those who take advantage of it."

Part of the tuition-waiver plan details certain requirements for admissions and financial aid, said Eugene Imai, UH chief financial officer. However, those requirements have not yet been released.

Student Services personnel are working on the details of the plan.

BOSTON- Despite the government's recent efforts to heighten security at Logan International Airport, a number of Bostonians remain wary of air travel.

"The American psyche is totally upset and afraid, and the Indian psyche too," said Raghu Pilaka, who arrived at Logan on Saturday from New York's La Guardia airport. "We are attacked by terrorists all the time in India; it's part of life, but the security is reasonable there."

The Associated Press reported air travel is up in the United States, though still well below levels prior to Sept. 11.

Logan has seen numerous changes since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Most recently, Gov. Jane Swift ordered the presence of the state National Guard at the airport, which President Bush called for to boost visible security.

"They're just eye candy for travelers," Pilaka said. "America never had security like this before. This is so much of a knee-jerk reaction that is happening."

Pilaka said the changes have significantly increased delays for travelers and discouraged him from traveling. While going through Logan security, he said, he had to remove almost every article from his luggage and show all contents to security.

"When talking about convenience, air travel in America is terrible, at least for short distances," Pilaka said. He added he was hoping to take the train back to New York today to avoid the extra hassles at the airport.

"I had to arrive two hours early for check in - and one hour before that just as a precaution - where the train is only four hours," he said.

Marigold Randall, a Boston photographer, contended Logan's security remains lax, saying European airports have demonstrated far tighter security efforts.

As a photographer, Randall said she travels with a lot of equipment that usually needs to be checked separately to avoid damage from the metal detectors. She said Logan security was not thorough in examining the equipment.

To Randall, Logan's involvement in the hijacking was not altogether surprising.

"It was a pity that it was Logan, but it doesn't surprise," she said. Still, she said she would not avoid going through the airport.

"I have a lot of trepidation about going back to Logan, but I mustn't be afraid," Randall said. "We all have to get over that fear; I will fly again."

THE ASIAN DANCE AND MUSIC PROGRAM PRESENTS
Japanese Bunraku Puppets
The Tendo Traditional Puppet Theater, Shiga Prefecture, Japan
Tuesday, October 9, Rand Theater at 7:30pm
Each puppet stands three to four feet tall and is manipulated by three operators, clothed completely in black, moving arms and fingers, legs, body, head, eyes, mouth and even eyebrows so realistically you soon forget the actors are made of wood and cloth. The puppet figures sob with grief and laugh with joy, eyebrows vibrating, eyes blinking, jointed fingers moving in expressive gestures. These puppets will delight the audience with their grace and emotion. The system of three-man operation, in which the main puppeteer operates the head and right hand, a second puppeteer manipulates the left hand, and the third moves the feet is a complicated and well choreographed dance between the puppet and the handlers.
A pre-concert talk by Jane Marie Law, Professor of Japanese Religions at Cornell University, begins at 7pm in Rand Theater.
$25, $20, $15, 17 and under $10; Students $10, $7, $5

Bay State institutions expanding through acquisition of property

By Daniel Remin
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON – Braintree. Allston. Watertown. What do these three towns all have in common?

They are all places where local universities have recently acquired land. In an ongoing effort to increase academic, athletic and other opportunities, many Boston-area colleges are expanding. With Harvard University's acquisition of 48 acres in north Allston, Mass., and 29 in Watertown, Mass., the question remains: What school will expand the farthest?

Boston University opened a new Braintree, Mass., facility, which is home to a campus for the University's Metropolitan College and an office for BU's Corporate Education Centers (BUCEC).

"This was done in collaboration with BUCEC," said MET Dean Jay Halford. "We wanted to open a facility south of Boston for information technology. It is a thriving, exciting area that is doing well, and many companies such as Reebok and State Street Bank have offices there. The facility will be used for training programs in information technology as well as for our new undergraduate completion program."

BUCEC is a two-year program mainly for adults who work full time but want to complete an undergraduate degree by taking classes part time. Currently there are 23 people enrolled, with each student taking three courses per semester, Halford said.

"It is very similar to an executive MBA program," he said. "We wanted to present an executive style with an undergraduate program. Our goal is to be the upper end, the first-class version of adult education. The Braintree facility is much more upscale than our existing facilities. It's in a beautiful setting and has an executive feel."

"Our Master Plan contains most of what we envision," University spokesman Colin Riley said. "We hope the Braintree facility does well and attracts many students it endeavors to serve through the Corporate Education Center."

"It's a new way of delivering education, and it is going very well. The students are excited. We identify the best people, which helps create a presence for the University and helps BU in the long run," Halford said.

While BU has been expanding around Commonwealth Avenue since the 1970s, the Braintree facility is a new type of expansion. Across the river, Harvard officials seem to think this type of growth might be useful, as well, with the purchase of land in north Allston and Watertown, which is over the bridge from their main Cambridge, Mass., campus.

"Harvard is growing and becoming landlocked on the Cambridge side," said University spokesman Joe Wrinn. "We need the land for use in the future."

Harvard officials said they are not sure what they will do with the land, but Senior Director of Community Relations Mary Power said it provides them with some long-term planning objectives.

"It gives us a chance to address and respond to new fields of study including the sciences and information technology," Power said.

Power has similar ideas to Wrinn's about the shortage of space in Cambridge. She said the densely developed residential communities caused them to look outside the area.

"This acquisition allows for the creation of a new academic precinct in Allston," said Kevin McCloskey, Harvard's director of community relations. "The key for us is working through our community master plan and clarifying our collective vision."

"This strengthens our academic mission," Power said.

Illn addition to the expansion beyond Harvard's gates, the Ivy League school's main campus currently is undergoing many of its own renovations and additions. According to a report, four buildings are already under construction, including Austin Hall (home of Harvard's Law School), the biological laboratory and the Widener Library.

Harvard's neighbor in Cambridge, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has not been without its share of expanding and remodeling either. The school even devotes an entire website to its various projects, http://web.mit.edu/evolving. According to the site, the Institute will add an additional 1 million square feet to its existing 154-acre campus. These comprise a new fitness center, a residence hall and renovations to the chemistry building.

"We haven't built in a long time," said Teri Weldner, communications manager for capital projects. "It is our time to make improvements to provide the facilities that meet space needs."

How does all this building, renovating and expanding outside the main campus affect students? Many said they do not consider it a big deal or see it as a major inconvenience.

"I enjoy Danielsen Hall," CAS sophomore Martha Prizio said. "I don't think it feels much different than living in Warren [Towers] except that there's less traffic because fewer people live here, and we do not have a dining hall."

Prizio also mentioned she needs to wake up a bit earlier for her classes because of the extra walking time or waiting for public transportation. But she said she likes her location.

"I would not prefer to live closer," she said. "The walk is usually very nice, and Danielsen is a great dorm. Many people enjoy being away from the high-traffic center of campus, and I am one of those people. Sometimes when I feel lazy, it is a chore to catch the shuttle, or walk when you're tired, but living closer has different drawbacks.'

Berkeley flaunts its identity crisis

By Eric Zhak
Daily Californian (U. California-Berkeley)

(U-WIRE) BERKELEY, Calif. – With people dressed in bumblebee costumes and a 15-foot papier-mâché dog on wheels winding their way through the streets of Berkeley, Calif., on Sunday, it could only mean one thing. Hundreds turned out for the annual "How Berkeley Can You Be?" parade and festival, which featured a mix of political messages and hilarity, brightly decorated floats and off-the-wall music, strange bicycles and couches on wheels.

The Cal Marching Band led the way, with a troupe of vibrant, artist-decorated cars, cultural performers and bizarre items on wheels in tow. Nearly 85 groups began marching from the corner of California Street and University Avenue to show onlookers the melting pot that is Berkeley.

The festival "is a nice venue for people to express their individuality," said Tina Khajman, an Albany, Calif., resident.

Prominent were groups expressing an interest in music and culture. From the hard rock and roll sounds of Haunted Barn, which was playing from the back of a pick-up, to the fresh tunes of Green Mountain Solar, music of all types could be heard throughout Downtown.

Echoing down the streets were the sounds of bongo drums from Ginga Brasil, a group devoted to preserving traditional Brazilian culture. Dancers and performers from the group showed the crowd a glimpse of the sights and sounds of their heritage.

Venezia, the group that organized the event, marched in chef costumes with large meatballs and plates of pasta to show their pride in Italian culture and promote the blending of different cultures.

Other groups such as Bad Rap Dogs dressed their dogs up in costumes and paraded with a monstrous flame-painted papier-mâché dog on wheels.

There was also the sharply dressed dance troupe Cheer San Francisco and the X-Plicit Players, who wore nothing at all.

Awestruck by the sheer number of diverse sights in the parade, the crowd was excited.

"It's the day of the year in Berkeley that people come together and act a little goofy," said Victor Herbert, a Berkeley resident. "Too bad we don't have it 365 days a year."

Many groups saw the parade as a time to unify the community in light of the recent attacks on the East Coast.

Some carried signs advocating peace, while others rode aboard a model tank.

The Los Fiarros Woods Community Marching Band displayed patriotism by dressing in red, white and blue and playing the Star Spangled Banner while marching. Haunted Barn, likewise, played a rock and roll rendition of the national anthem.

"It's good to see things like this, especially at times like this," said Lashawn Nolen, a security guard. "It's so unifying. It's good to see people coming together once again."

Some saw the parade as a reminder to be open-minded. There was a constant call for acceptance from participants.

"We must learn to love each other. Otherwise war might erupt," said local celebrity Pink Man, while riding on his unicycle in a pink leotard.

The parade wound through Downtown and ended at Martin Luther King Jr. Civic Center Park. There, people celebrated with food, drinks and more music.

The parade originated in 1945 as a way of celebrating Berkeley craziness.

Donations key to life

If there is one positive thing that came out of the terrorist attacks of September 11, it has to be the outpouring of support in the form of blood donations that the American Red Cross has collected. In fact, in the first four days after the tragedy, the Red Cross's on-hand supply doubled from 80,000 units to 150,000 units, something that hasn't happened since the Persian Gulf War.

The announcements have already been made weeks ago that our blood donations are NOT going to the terrorist victims themselves. Sadly, part of that reason is because not nearly as many survivors as had been hoped have been found. Nevertheless, blood drive lines continue to be packed. This is not a bad thing. Year after year, we all heard about the massive shortage of blood that the American Red Cross has in its reserves. Every year, hundreds of thousands of us did nothing about it.

That's starting to change, and we need to keep it up. The drive in the Campus Center last week had Red Cross workers giving students numbers like they were in line waiting to be served at a deli. That says a lot: people want to help now. While the injuries from the tragedy have begun to heal, the need for blood has not. Our future is uncertain. "The United States is moving toward a war footing. These terrorist attacks may not be over and the American Red Cross must ensure an available supply of blood, including a reserve for both civilian and military use, so we are prepared in this period of great uncertainty," Red Cross spokesperson Lesly Hallman said in a U.S.A. Today article.

There, they said it. WAR. No one quite knows what to expect after the U.S's planned retaliation. No one knows how long President Bush's efforts to stamp out terrorism will last. For that reason, the Red Cross is taking every precaution to make sure that there's enough blood to go around in the event of an emergency. Not only is the concern there for needing blood in the event of another terrorist attack, the Red Cross needs to stay on top of the blood demand for the entire mobilizing military force. Make no bones about it: when America retaliates, American blood will be shed, too.

The worry or concern that if America collects too much blood it will be wasted is outdated. Technology is a beautiful thing, and it has been put to work in blood banks just like it has everywhere else. The Red Cross has been freezing blood for thirty years, mainly the rare blood types so they get them.

They've changed that now, and as they continue to stockpile blood for the unexpected they'll freeze it. Blood has a frozen shelf life of over ten years –there are no concerns about the stuff "going bad" anytime soon once it's frozen.

Don't give blood because of paranoia over what may happen in the next few months with our terrorist enemies. Give blood because it's a good thing to do. Give blood because even if it is not used tomorrow for a victim in New York City, it will be for some good purpose in the not-so-distant future.

Find yourself and you find happiness

"Above all else to thine own self be true" –Shakespeare

In one of my previous columns, I mentioned that one of my goals to meet by the end of senior year is to get a job. But as any journalism major can tell you, the prospects of finding a decent position in the field with a respectable salary are fairly slim. Add to that the fact that I happen to be female and you get the picture. Even if I were to start at the bottom, for example, working as a copy editor for a newspaper or a newscaster for a small town television station, I would inevitably encounter the glass ceiling somewhere along the way. It's not complainant, but then again, what profession is, when you're one in a million just hoping to get your foot in the door? Especially in a dog-eat-dog field, such as the one I have chosen for myself.

TEHANI SCHNEIDER

The past few weeks have compelled me to open my eyes and rethink my goals and aspirations. In large part, it is because graduation looms large on the horizon. Come May, I'll join the educated, unemployed masses. But secondary to this is the criticism the media has received for its coverage of the national crisis. Journalists and the mass media alike have been reproached for their biased, unduly patriotic commentary. Some have even been chastised for their simple, instinctive reaction to emote in the wake of the tragedy.

I can see the argument on both sides. One of the rules of the field is to maintain objectivity, and certainly they have failed to do so. However, given the unprecedented nature of the situation, how does one keep their emotions in check and deliver the news and updates in an impartial manner? I believe, in such instances, conformity should be thrown to the wayside. What a rarity it was to watch self-possessed network heavyweights like Dan Rather tear up on Letterman while discussing the coverage and the victims he interviewed. Rather, like his counterparts, was unjustly accused of hate, even more so because of his position, but it was a memorable sight seeing his stoic facade crumble and his unflappable disposition dissolve. It was a touching reminder that journalists are humans too. It was beautiful.

I am an emotional person by nature and I believe I made the wrong decision when I chose my major three years ago. In retrospect, I picked journalism because writing has always been a passion of mine and something that I am fairly competent at. Writing allows me to express my emotions in an infinite number of ways, a freedom that is restrained by the fundamentals of my major. The aesthetic proponents are endless – using the outlet of creativity one can explore the deepest recesses of the mind, soar through time and space and back to the present, question the theory of relativity if they so desire and expound upon the gray areas of life. I have never viewed the world in black and white, as right or wrong. I have always tried to be more open-minded, to keep within the realm of feasibility. Everything is more complex; everything can be Technicolor. It all depends on how we see it.

So, you may ask, why didn't I choose English as a major? To this, I'll say that I have always enjoyed the literary aspect of journalism more than reporting. I do like to be influenced by the works of others, but taking a class discussing the lives of Hemingway and Milton is not my cup of tea. I am an observer with a keen eye for detail, but I am also opinionated to a fault, and more often than not, I like my voice to be heard. I know that if I had been one of the reporters on the scene during this tragedy, I would have been unable to maintain my composure. This, of course, would not serve well if I truly aspire to be a no-nonsense, impassionate reporter.

What I also know is that although writing is one of my passions, I've always had a love for the fine arts as well – art, music, dance, theater, you name it. But I haven't truly acted since I played Maria in a kid's version of West Side Story when I was 10, and although I danced for fourteen years (eight of those years competitively) there's a little something called alcohol that I love too much to give up. Hey, it's the only thing keeping me sane at this point.

So it remains to be seen what I will do after I graduate. What do I want to do with my life? What do I want to be? This is the perpetual question that I have asked myself with increasing frequency over the last few months, and one that I have been unable to answer. I'm only 21. Do I have to answer it now? Do I have to know now?

My answer to that last question is no. I can make that decision somewhere down the road. I also know that I have never relished the idea of the daily routine, crammed into my own stuffy cubby at 9 like a caged animal, anticipating my release at 5. I guess I'll just have to be Office Space mindset. Damn, it feels good to be a gangsta. When I mentioned this to my roommate, who happens to be an accounting major, she replied that no one likes his or her job but we all work to make money. Easy for her to say. It's a piece of cake for the cult of SOM to find jobs, the lot of self-deprecating, money whores in-training that they are. (For those of you in SOM I mean this with tongue firmly in cheek. So please don't deluge me with hate mail.) I know many of you do love what you plan to do, and have a natural affinity for those skills. More power to you.

Well, maybe I'm a just a brat if I think I can be exempt from the 9-5 daily grind. Maybe I'm still clinging to pipe dreams. The truth will reveal itself in time, but one lesson that has been hammered home time and again, especially over the past few weeks, is that life is fleeting. And it's too short to not do what you love to do, to waste any more time. I write this column for those of you out there, like me, who fear following your dreams, as fanciful and unrealistic as they may be. The immortal words of the Bard that I've quoted above will ring with undeniable, renewed clarity for you all.

Using UMass as an excuse

MELISSA ZYLSTRA

On the occasions when I do something stupid, which is actually more frequently than I care to admit, I always cushion my mistake by backing it up by the fact that I go to a state school. This causes the crowd to roar with laughter and then I am forgiven for a peccadillo or missed Jeopardy answer.

Let me give you an example, the other day someone asked me how to spell something, and I spelled it wrong. It went like this,

"Melody, how do you spell budget?"

"Easy, b-u-g-i-t."

"NO, that's absolutely incorrect."

"Hey, I only go to a state school. Give me a break."

Everyone had a chuckle. You'd be surprised by the stupidity you can get away with just by admitting your enrollment at UMass.

Our school is being evaluated this fall semester. Billy decided it was time to survey the premises, clean out the gutters, do a little yard work and spread some new mulch. I'm speaking metaphorically. I can because I took an English class once. When you think about it, somehow the flower box adjacent to the library makes you feel better. That new landscaping in front of South College is kind of reassuring. "Hey, they care about us," we think. "They want us to learn among the flowers."

Then the realization hits: "Hey, wait a minute : they want the tour groups to see the flowers." What screams higher education louder than bunches of ferns and gladiolas? The prospective students will then come to the school, and pay us money that, according to the current study, will not be spent on our academics at all.

We don't all pay the same tuition. There's in-state tuition, out-of-state tuition or your-aunt-works-in-the-bursar's-office tuition. I get a free ride because I let Whitey stay in our basement (only during the week though, he's got a sweet little thing down in Rhode Island that he visits on the . . . ahhh, I've said too much). No matter what numbers you write on your check though, we'd like to think that you're paying for your education.

According to last week's report, we're not. We're paying for athletics, financial aid and what the Boston Globe calls, "other non-academic costs." God only knows what those are: Flower boxes? Parties at the Chancellor's house? Carrots and sugar cubes for the horse police? Dining common staff field trips to Foxwood's? I hear those lunch ladies know how to roll.

What's clear is that our school doesn't have its priorities straight when the basketball team has gold-plated zippers on its warm-up suits but your philosophy class was canceled due to the lack of a qualified instructor.

I can honestly admit I've never actually felt like a sheep here.

Granted, I'm only a social security number, a single face in a sea of thousands. I've been fortunate enough to have a wonderful major with great instructors. I have a great job. My friends who go to Northeastern, Boston University, and Providence College are going to be paying for their educations well into their adult years. I think I get a good education here for the money paid, and I'll be the first one to admit that. Even without the harboring-a-fugitive discounts, what makes UMass worth my money isn't the university at all, but my teachers and my job.

> "What screams higher education louder than bunches of ferns and gladiolas?"

Visit www.umass.edu and you see the link "UMass in the News," and various headlines about teachers winning awards and making groundbreaking advances in their field. I realize these are the kind of things that get money for the school, but there's rarely anything concerning students. Our fair university seems to neglect student events or anything we do. I know we do more as a campus community than keg stands and orgies. I just know there are less-offensive items that can be pointed out proudly. My critics will argue that the University is a place where revolutionary progress is made in the fields of science, engineering and other top programs. So we place a greater emphasis on those because that's what we do best and what, in turn, brings us more funding.

If you happened to read last Wednesday's Globe you'd have seen a breakdown of exactly what our tuition is spent on. The Athletics program costs UMass $11.3 million. When placed among six comparative academic institutions, we spend 4% less per student on student instruction and research and 11% less on libraries and technology.

The motivation behind the evaluation is that we need to attract a first-class chancellor. After the final numbers are crunched and the results are in who knows what programs will be cut.

So kids, we need to band together to save our respective educations.

I'm thinking something along the lines of a huge bake sale. We also need to pay attention to this nine-month evaluation and its results. In the mean time I suggest you enjoy the gladiolas before they're killed by the first frost or pruned away by a budget cut.

Trust in your heroes

I'm contemplating the word 'justice.' It is something we have all heard enough about lately. Yet, do we understand its full implications? Of course we know that America wants some sort of closure after the countless losses we have suffered. But what no one really knows is what the right course of action is and how we as a nation are to proceed, though we have already been exposed to many different perspectives.

MEAGAN RUNDELL

We have all seen or heard about the President's pseudo-comforting, bloodthirsty assurance that "we will hunt down and punish those responsible," and that "we will make no distinction between the terrorists who committed these acts and those who harbor them."

And many of us have witnessed the peace protestors on college campuses nationwide, banners and voices uplifted and saturated with demands for a pacified nation – a modern-day Vietnam we never dreamed we'd live to see.

These two extremes illustrate the ideals many Americans are torn between – revenge for an unbelievable yet all too real tragedy, and the complex fear of war and simultaneous need for structure and peace.

Are we safe without a war? Are we safe in the midst of one?

I too feel the immense weight of these questions bearing down on my shoulders. But there is one other perspective we must consider in this time of national conflict and indecision regarding justice – those of the warriors themselves.

I spoke to a friend today who is enlisted in the Marine Corps Infantry Division. The conversation, charged with an eerie knowledge of what circumstances had thus far brought to bear, created a blurred yet emerging vision of what lay ahead. I asked how he was doing and he answered, "So far, so good." Then I inquired what he had been doing lately and he replied, "Waiting for that call."

"That call," with a few short orders barked into the receiver, may take him to distant lands that are as terrifying as they are unfamiliar. "That call" will send tremors of fear through the souls of his family and friends, including me. And yet "that call" for him, although nerve-wracking and painful, will only further steel the resolve of a man who loves his country with such passion that he would sacrifice his all to defend it. He is not simply fighting for soil. He is fighting for all of those who have prayed to God he would not have to. The pride he takes in his role as a defender is immeasurable.

He recently quoted the words of John Stuart Mill who said:

"War is an ugly thing, but not the ugliest of things. The decayed and degraded state of moral and patriotic feeling which thinks that nothing is worth war is much worse. The person who has nothing for which he is willing to fight, nothing which is more important than his own personal safety, is a miserable creature and has no chance of being free unless made and kept so by the exertions of better men than himself."

> "War is an ugly thing, but not the ugliest of things."

So before any of us jump to rash conclusions about the type and amount of justice we should attempt to inflict upon the persecutors of our country, let us first consider the issue from the standpoint of one who has much to lose yet nothing to fear when it comes to doing what he feels is right and imperative. Before speaking to him, I held the same opinion as the peace advocates, because I don't agree with many of the tactics our country's administrators have proposed as retaliation options, but also in large part due to my own personal fears. Would war ever confront me or my loved ones face-to-face, in a manner similar to those on the hijacked flights, or in the World Trade Center and the Pentagon?

But I believe that if our country does not retaliate, we may appear weaker than if we do, leaving us vulnerable to additional attacks. Let me make myself completely clear – I DO NOT support the taking of innocent, civilian lives in a mass attack meant to eliminate the suspected perpetrators of the attacks of September 11. In an ideal situation, American intelligence would track down each and every perpetrator of the attacks, and justice would be duly administered. Unfortunately, this feat most likely could not be accomplished without the aid of troops overseas, if at all.

Thus, facing the reality that war on some scale is probably inevitable, I reflect again upon the conversation with my friend. Speaking with him made me realize that, disconcerting as a war undoubtedly is, America nonetheless houses a precious resource – members of the United States military who share courage and decisiveness in a situation that requires both. If war is truly necessary, I for one feel safer knowing there are people such as these ready and willing to defend our country in its hour of necessity.

HEARTS IN ATLANTIS

I've wonder why so many movies based on books are being made? In recent years, Hollywood has shown a drastic decrease in movies written exclusively for the silver screen, and a steady increase in adaptations from novels and short stories. Making a worthy transition from page to screen is a black and white situation – the result can be outstanding, like this past summer's Shrek, or completely dismal, as was the case with Along Come A Spider.

Falling somewhere in that gray area is the new film Hearts In Atlantis. Hearts is based on a book "by the author of The Green Mile" a.k.a Stephen King. Even with his name on it, it's difficult to understand why this film was made in the first place. The book is certainly one of King's weakest works, failing to win rave reviews from fans and critics alike. Additionally, it is made up of five short stories with only a vague theme tying them all together.

The movie Hearts In Atlantis only focuses on the longest and most moving of these stories, "Low Men In Yellow Coats," scrapping the other four, including the one bearing the movie and the book's title. While the script stays true to the story of "Low Men..." the pacing of the film is rushed and leaves too many questions unanswered.

After the death of a childhood friend, Bobby Garfield (David Morse, also in The Green Mile) returns home for the funeral. As soon as he arrives, he learns that another one of his friends, Carol, had also died a few years earlier. Since the rest of the movie is done in flashback there is no mystery left for the audience, the fates of these two characters already revealed. By giving all of this information in the first 10 minutes, it takes away from the audience experiencing any shock from the news of the two deaths.

The audience is then catapulted back to the summer of Bobby's 11th birthday. The upstairs apartment in Bobby's house has just been rented by Ted Brautigan (Anthony Hopkins), a man with a mysterious past. The two immediately bond, and Ted gives Bobby the job of reading him the newspaper everyday and being on the lookout for "low men," the thugs who Ted thinks are out to get him.

This is where the questions begin to pile up. It is soon made apparent that Ted possesses some sort of magical power, one where he can read people's minds, but the true extent of his ability is not defined. He passes this along to Bobby at some point too, but when and how is never answered. This is not a major flaw since the audience is able to get the gist of it, but it is a slight annoyance that such a crucial plot point is not clearly resolved.

As Ted and Bobby become closer, the "low men" draw near. For Bobby, it's clear that the "low men" represent the beginning of his adulthood – as well as dealing with his selfish mother, his first love Carol and possibly losing his best friend and father figure, Ted. Yet, it is not clear what the real "low men" mean to the greater body of the movie. Are they just thugs trying to bottle Ted's magical power, or are they from another world as some evidence shows?

Only those who have read King's Dark Tower series will have a greater understanding as to the origins of the "low men." As for everyone else, the only solution is to see them as thugs. While this will suffice, it still feels like a gaping hole has been left in the story, frustrating the moviegoer. Hearts In Atlantis is more an offshoot to the cult following of the Dark Tower series, rather than a movie that stands on its own. Because of this fact, it is curious why it was made into a film at all.

In the original book, "Hearts In Atlantis" refers to a card game that the characters play in the third story. Screenwriter William Goldman (who is also writing the screenplay for the next Stephen King movie DreamCatcher), managed to give it a whole new meaning to fit the boundaries of the film version, and it seems a more appropriate fit: "There are such times of happiness as a child that you feel as though you are in some magical place, like Atlantis must have been." Goldman's adaptation closely resembles "Low Men..." but puts key moments in the wrong places and leaves moviegoers confused about several story line components.

Director Scott Hicks became best known for his award-winning biopic Shine, a movie acclaimed by fans for its attention to details. Hearts In Atlantis is just the opposite, with no emphasis on anything. Both Hopkins and newcomer Anton Yelchin, as young Bobby, deliver top-drawer performances, but the casting of the not-so-talented Hope Davis as Bobby's mother is painful to watch. Davis' portrayal of her character makes you understand Hicks wanting to rush through her scenes.

It's a shame that Hearts In Atlantis turned out the way it did with such a talented team behind it. There are traces of a great film in there, but it never is able to come to the surface.

Don't 'see' a word

DON'T SAY A WORD
Directed by Gary Fleder
Playing at CineMark

If actors were born to play a certain role, then Michael Douglas was put on this earth to be the slick New York professional in Don't Say a Word, whose perfect existence is doomed to be undone. As hero or as villain, Douglas has played a similar role in films stretching as far back as Fatal Attraction. In the grimly competent kidnap thriller Don't Say A Word, Douglas takes on one of the more sympathetic characters of his career, playing a psychiatrist whose daughter is kidnapped by a cabal of stone-faced thugs.

The question in Hollywood is whether or not audiences will accept this kind of film so shortly after the September 11th tragedies. Especially one set in New York, complete with fleeting glimpses of the Twin Towers. The answer is... probably. Audiences have always been drawn, unsalubriously, to these kinds of movies and the Saturday night screening I attended was full; just last spring, audiences gave a free ride to Along Come A Spider, despite the fact it wasn't a particularly good movie. Don't Say A Word is a slightly better model, but it's still built on a foundation of cliché and contrivance.

The movie opens in 1991, with five guys pulling a bank robbery in order to steal a blood-red diamond worth $10 million. At first, it feels as if the audience has stumbled into yet another post-Tarantino double-cross heist film – and sure enough, two of the members abscond with the jewel.

Cut to 2001, the day before Thanksgiving – Douglas' Dr. Nathan Conrad shows himself to be the ultimate caring, sensitive male by treating a teenaged panty thief, picking up a Thanksgiving turkey and agreeing to take a pro bono case involving a young schizophrenic (Brittany Murphy) who slashed up an orderly. All before going home to care for his wife Aggie (Famke Janssen), stuck in bed with a broken leg, and their smart young daughter Jessie (Sky McCole Bartusiak).

The next morning, Conrad discovers his daughter is missing. The kidnappers, led by Koster (Sean Bean, best known as James Bond's nemesis in GoldenEye and the guy who hawks Acuvue contact lenses on TV) make an odd demand. Conrad's newest patient has a number stuck in her head and the doctor has until 5 p.m. to get her to reveal it. If he involves the cops or misses the deadline, the girl is dead.

That would be enough plot for a normal thriller, but Don't Say A Word, adapted from the novel by Andrew Klavan, just keeps on going. So, there's the robbery and the kidnapping – now add onto that the story of poor, not-so-crazy Elizabeth. See, she witnessed the murder of her father when she was eight and has spent the last decade in institutions. Meanwhile, there's a seemingly unrelated subplot involving a tough detective (Jennifer Esposito) investigating the murder of a young woman.

Don't Say A Word is so intent on being a sensational, neo-Hitchcock thriller that it never figures out that it would've been more enjoyable had it pruned a few extraneous subplots.

The director, Gary Fleder, has an assured visual sense and, working with the moody cinematography of Amir Mokri, crafts a foreboding atmosphere. But he's as close to Hitchcock as Robert Zemeckis was with What Lies Beneath, or Gus Van Sant was with the god-awful Psycho remake. A scene in which Conrad tries to navigate his way through a parade falls flat- where Hitch would've done it with aplomb. However, a sequence in which Conrad forces Elizabeth to relive her father's murder is splendid. Fleder worked this material before (in 1997's hackneyed Kiss The Girls) and if he hasn't learned from his mistakes, he has at least improved on them.

The greatest asset the movie has is its cast. Douglas is a commanding presence throughout the movie, and it's a credit that he doesn't merely sleepwalk through the role. Bean is appropriately menacing, never veering over the top. Despite the fact that her character isn't shaded in enough, Murphy is impressive as Elizabeth.

Too bad, the movie – which for this cast is nothing more than an exercise – isn't deserving of them.

Nelly and Eminem – Sharing the ice and bling

It only makes sense. Become a millionaire rap star, and take your friends along for the ride. Although their rapping styles contrast, Eminem and Nelly have more in common than one might think. Both spent years struggling to get record executives to give them a listen. After getting a chance, both went on to achieve multi-platinum rap/pop crossover success. Now that they have all the chedda, bling and ice one could ask for, why not spread the wealth a little by doing an album with their posses?

Last summer Eminem's Detroit crew – D-12 – and Nelly's St. Louis boys – The St. Lunatics – unleashed their major label debuts on the hip hop nation. Eminem and Nelly both joined their mates on the albums as full-fledged members of the groups. However, the comparisons between the groups end there. With entirely different styles, the Lunatics and D-12 are far apart musically.

D-12's debut Devils Night provides more of the profanity laced, shocking and gross-out style of hip hop that Eminem put forth on his two solo efforts. If there is a line of what is appropriate, D-12 might as well have not only gone over the line, but trampled all over the thing and blown it up. Versus about drug use, school violence, murder, rape, masturbation and even sodomizing one's own grandmother are as common as "wave your hands in the air" is at a rap concert.

The most bizarre member of the group, aptly named "Bizarre," provides the most wacked-out moments of a wacked-out album. "Smacked this whore for talking crap," he rhymes on "Fight Music," "so what if she's handicap." Still, his bandmates – Kon Artis, Proof, Kuniva and Swifty – provide their share of moments throughout the album as well. Just a sample: "Shut your mouth you dirty slut, you know you want it in your butt," from "Purple Pills." Whether they delve into the mind of a killer in "American Psycho," or a sexual pervert in "Nasty Mind," D-12 has a unique ability to draw the listener in to whatever disturbing story they choose to tell.

Aside from the X-rated lyrics, the other notable aspect of Devils Night is the stellar production by Eminem and Dr. Dre. Clearly, Eminem took a lot of what he learned from Dre, and he couldn't have asked for a better teacher. Like Dre, Eminem produced unique and catchy beats and hooks that managed to have a pop like quality, while still doing justice to the hardcore lyrics. The tribute to getting high, "Purple Pills," is the catchiest track, with its scratchy dance-able beats and harmonica sample. The album closing "Devils Night," and "American Psycho," both of which feature creepy beats that sound like they were sampled off of the "Tales From The Crypt" soundtrack, stand out as two of Em's best produced works. Dre's contribution, "Ain't Nuttin But Music," has the same bouncy beats as "The Real Slim Shady" and is Dre's best production moment on the album.

As D-12's fictional (sort of) record executive Steve Berman says during a skit on Devils Night in which he is critical of D-12's controversial sound, "I don't want to rape my grandmother. I don't want to have sex with pit bulls. I wanna roll on dubs. I wanna throw bows. I wanna rock Prada." Well, if he wanted that thing, he surely came to the right place with the St. Lunatics.

With the same happy go lucky beats and song topics as Nelly's Country Grammar, the Loonies –Ali, Murphy Lee, Kyjuan, and Nelly - provide a more mainstream product than D-12. There are songs about their hometown ("St. Louie"), their rides ("Okay"), bling ("Jang-a Lang"), sex ("Boom d. Boom") and summertime ("Summer in the City").

Like Nelly's album, "lay E" Epperson produced all of the tracks. Still, they weren't able to come up with a "Ride Wit Me," "Country Grammar," or "E.I" level of a hit song. Suffering from lack of variety, Free City is a tough listen from beginning to end, unless one is passionate about Nelly's Midwest style of pop hop, that is just barely street enough (throw in a few swears to make it that way) to prevent it from being lumped in with Will Smith.

Even so, the album does provide some fun moments. Tracks like "Midwest Swing" and "Let Me In Now" resonate such a care free and cool vibe that it is easy to believe that Nelly and his crew really are enjoying their lifestyles of fast cars and fast women. Certainly, they aren't afraid to tell us about it.

Whenever someone says, "hip hop all sounds the same," don't believe him or her. The debuts from D-12 and The St. Lunatics might as well be filed under different categories in the music store. Although both were solid, both will likely have to rely on their superstar leaders for future albums and fan support. But hey, it pays to have friends in high places.

Couture = high fashion

WITH SHAUNA BILLNGS

Ah, the feeling of longing of wanting something that will never be yours. It's not jealousy, it's just dreaming. Such is haute couture.

What's that? You haven't spoken a bit of French since high school? Mon ami, allow me to explain. Haute couture is to the world of fashion what the World Series is to a little league game; what a lobster bisque is to Campbell's soup; and what a Mercedes Benz is to an El Camino.

Haute couture is the creation of a perfect piece of wearable art. Hundreds of hours are put into the creation of each outfit and the dress is customized to a person's form, hanging and flowing like an extension of a person's body. These creations require several fittings, so that the piece is cut to perfection by the twenty fourth of an inch.

With all the hours and expensive materials put in to the outfits, it is no quandary that these high fashion pieces can cost from $10,000 to hundreds of thousands of dollars. Though many may say that the ensembles are outlandishly priced, the quality and perfection of the pieces cannot be belittled.

The haute couture industry began in the mid 1800's with Charles Worth, who set up shop in Paris designing gowns especially for his clients, including the Empress Eugenie, Napoleon III's wife. He customized necklines, sleeves, fabrics and decorations – all to his client's tastes – then fit the dress specifically to her body.

For the past 150 years, the haute couture industry has survived despite setbacks. Society has changed since haute couture's origin and its golden age. Up until World War II, the world was filled with more powerful monarchies, debutantes, Robber Barons and their monopolies and society mavens – and their evenings consisted of balls, premieres and dinner parties. As society changed – becoming more casual and more conservative with money – the haute couture houses began to dwindle.

Today, there are 18 official haute couture houses in Paris, including Christian Dior, Emanuel Ungaro, Chanel, Yves Saint Laurent and Givenchy. In fact, Paris takes its couture so seriously that there is a chamber set up to govern over the couture houses and watch for those who try to use the name haute couture without officially having it bestowed upon their house.

Twice a year, the houses showcase their latest designs in both haute couture and ready-to-wear. Ready-to-wear fashions do not have the intricacies of haute couture, and are therefore more readily affordable to the public. Since the average person is more apt to purchase ready-to-wear fashions, designers stick with more marketable looks – creating coats, gowns and suits that could be worn many times and in innumerate situations. But with haute couture, the designer is free, and can create a celebration of beauty and art in a wearable masterpiece.

Some designers create haute couture lines similar to their ready-to-wear styles, but in more expensive cloths and furs. Other designers seize the opportunity to create items that would be seen by most as unwearable, due to their bizarre designs or sheer fabrics. But whether the pieces are unwearable, unbearable or undurcable – they are still a pleasure to look at.

In July, the Fall 2001 haute couture lines were shown in Paris. These looks, no matter how outlandish, will trickle down into mainstream fashion in one form or another in a season or two. A glimpse at some of what was shown:

Christian Dior mixed a variety of materials inspired by those worn in Tibet, Japan, Peru and the Middle East. Bright furs and brilliantly painted gauzes exploded on his runway.

Givenchy went sophisticated with sleek city looks. Black ruled his runways in mattes and shines, and fur and feathers accented the elegance.

Valentino, always known for classic lines, created a line of simple daywear including classic suits and coats, as well as a stunning selection of gowns sure to be donned by the Hollywood elite at this year's Emmy Awards.

Versace went wild this year, as it is apt to do being led by Donatella Versace. The Barbie-doll models strutted their glittery boots down the runway with big hair, big shine and big colors. Pastel and white ermine fur trimmed a variety of pieces.

Christian Lacroix drew upon his French and Spanish background to create his line – a tribute to European fashions of old. Red and black dominated the color scheme. Spanish lace and ruffles trimmed gowns and blouses, and tulip skirts fluttered down the runway.

Running themes for the Fall/Winter haute couture that we can expect to see in magazines and stores soon: mixes of cultural fabrics, Tibetan fur boots with silken Japanese kimonos or rainbow Peruvian woven jackets, lots of lace and fur trims, tulip skirts that extend below the knee, the return of the daytime dress, gauze fabrics and ribbon trinkets on everything.

Fashion shows were viewed on style.com and elle.com.

Givenchy displayed classic gowns.

Christian Dior showed gauzey styles.

DU spikes Minutewomen

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

After Xavier proved to be an unruly guest on Friday night in throttling its host, the Massachusetts women's volleyball team had hoped to rebound against another Buckeye State foe, the University of Dayton. Unfortunately, a few bad breaks and stellar all-around play from their opponents spelled doom for the Minutewomen.

UMass fell to the Flyers 3-1 on Saturday night in a match that saw four highly contested games in which momentum swung like a pendulum.

Each game was either tied or within a couple points until the very end, but Dayton was simply able to capitalize on more of its chances than the Maroon and White.

"I thought we played very well," said Head Coach Bonnie Kenny. "We competed really hard, but were just not able to terminate [on offense]."

Sophomore Nitia Small again led the way on offense for the Minutewomen, slamming home 17 kills while contributing 12 digs on the defensive end. Seniors Esmarie Hovet and Janeen DeMarte chipped in with 14 and 13 kills, respectively. However, Dayton's attack was far more versatile as five Flyers totaled double-digit kills. Senior Xinxin Zhang from Beijing, China was a dominant force as she blasted 19 kills, while Katie Ferriell supplied 17 kills on the offensive end and 20 digs on the other side of the ball.

"I thought we played really hard, but it was really hard work on defense," said Maroon and White junior setter Jidka Stehnova. "They just had more kills than us."

Stehnova finished with 47 assists in supporting the UMass attack while totaling 19 digs on defense.

Game one saw both teams exchange points consistently until Dayton reeled off four in a row to take a 14-9 advantage. Behind the offensive firepower of Hovet and Lauren Vander Veen, the Minutewomen chipped away and had the lead twice in the game, the second being a 25-25 advantage. However, two kills each from the Flyers' Zhang and Susan Westbrock helped the visitors rally back and take the first game, 30-28.

The second contest was as hard-fought as the first, as the lead changed hands several times during the game. UMass built a 6-3 lead after a Dayton service error, but then fell behind 16-12. Towards the end of the match, Dayton gained control and kept the Minutewomen at bay, always holding a two or three point advantage. The Maroon and White pulled to within 28-26 after a DeMarte kill and got as close as 29-28, but Westbrock slammed home the deciding kill to give the Flyers a 2-0 advantage.

UMass stayed strong, though, and was able to take game three by a tally of 30-28. The Maroon and White had control for most of the game, building several leads, including its biggest at 23-18 after a Hovet kill. Dayton roared back and managed to grab the lead at 28-27 after Zhang slammed home what was then her fourteenth kill of the match. However, UMass maintained its composure and won the next three points, finishing off the game with a DeMarte kill to cut the Dayton lead to 2-1.

In game four, Dayton was able to finish off the Minutewomen with a strong performance. UMass could never sustain a sizable rally during the game, while Dayton put together a six-point run to take a 25-18 advantage.

UMass tried to claw back, but the Flyer attack was too much, and Zhang finished off her offensive display by slamming down her final kill to give Dayton the 30-25 win and the match.

"Dayton was more physical than we were," said Kenny. "We needed Lauren and Esmarie to be as effective as they were.

"They just had more firepower than us. When we needed kills, we didn't get them."

UMass looks green at Brown

By Elena Ponesis
Collegian Staff

The cool autumn air and changing leaves indicate to most people that Thanksgiving, Christmas and the end of the year are approaching. But for the Massachusetts men's tennis team, it's year has just begun – with a trip to Providence, Rhode Island this past Friday for its first tournament of the season, the Brown Invitational.

With a green roster, the Brown Invitational provided the squad with the opportunity to test its skills against high-caliber opponents from schools such as Brown University, Columbia University, Boston College, Marist College and Atlantic 10 foe Rhode Island.

The majority of the squad suffered losses in the second round of singles play after advancing past the first round of competition. Though the Maroon and White fared better in the 2000 tournament, it faced a much tougher field this year and showed promise for the all-important conference play that kicks off in the spring.

In singles play, No. 1 Steve Prisco slammed opponent Shawn Attia 6-1, 6-1 in the first round of Flight A. The freshmen shone in Flight B, as Scott Sans-Icaeb breezed past Pat Mountjan from Providence College 6-3, 6-2, and Reid Stubbs defeated Boston University's Josh Holbrook 6-4, 6-4.

Junior Eric Reblin, who played his first tournament in a couple of years, performed at a higher level than last weekend's matches as he prevailed 6-4, 5-7, 7-5 against George Green of Farleigh Dickinson University in Flight C.

"On a positive note, five of our six guys won the first round match," Assistant Coach Scott Willkins said. "Though they were all defeated in the second round, if we had lost the first round we would have been placed in the consolation round and won more matches, but against easier opponents."

In doubles action, the three UMass tandems each won their first round matches and looked solid despite the fact that none of them played together last season. The pairing of Sans-Icaeb and Prisco looked impressive defeating Rosland/Moynihan 8-6 in a pro-set match. Only the pairing of Reblin and Todd Champeau (Flight B) advanced to the third round of competition, beating Sarria/Bogaanos of Farleigh Dickinson 9-8 and Spring/Ellingeren of Vermont 8-3.

Champeau/Reblin did not play in the third round, as the Maroon and White chose to depart after waiting hours for this one match.

The Minutemen returned home to Amherst with increased match toughness and experience, as every member of the line-up benefited from this warm-up tournament. No. 1 Prisco tuned up his mechanics after playing little tennis over the summer months and Reblin played his first major tournament since transferring from Texas and losing a year of his eligibility. Freshmen Sans-Icaeb and Stubbs competed in their first collegiate tournament and showed maturity and experience despite their youth.

"This was our first tournament of the season and many of the other schools we competed against have already competed in other tournaments," said Wilkins. "No. 1 Steve Prisco works a lot during the summer and doesn't get a chance to play much. But he's in better shape than last year and he'll come around."

Today the Minutemen will take what they learned in Rhode Island and apply it to their next challenge – the Terriers of Boston University. The UMass squad shut out the Terriers 7-0 on their home court one year ago today. However, their line-up looks quite different from year to year and they may give the Minutemen more trouble this season.

"We should be better prepared now that we've played two matches and a tournament," said Coach Judy Dixon. "However, BU has a lot of foreign students and an influx of new people all the time. I usually don't know a lot about their players, which is unusual.

I know that they're a rebuilt team. However, my expectation is that we should be the favorite if all goes according to plan."

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – A good, slow, concentrated technique is the key to success today. Any shortcuts you take at this time are sure to reduce your effectiveness. Note: Febreeze is not the same as washing your clothes. Happy birthday Andrea!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – How are you ever going to get to the bottom of things this way? It's certainly time for you to streamline your efforts and sharpen your focus. In other words, beer will not help you.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Put yourself in best array today and you can present yourself before others most favorably. Much depends upon their reaction at this time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Someone you know and respect may be willing to give you a helping hand today. Ask for it, or it's not likely to be offered.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You mustn't be afraid of sharing your opinion with those around you today. You can expect the response to be favorable in the least. So that guy in your history class you're pining, go talk to him. Tell him he has nice shoes.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You will find yourself relying on others far more than usual today. Your focus will be shifting in a subtle way in the days to come.

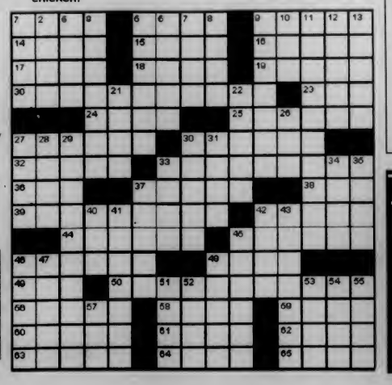
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Environmental influences are not to be ignored today, but you can avoid any long-term affects of those things that prove hazardous.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – A special someone will be playing a more pivotal role in your own affairs before the day is out. Take the hint. Try to win their affections by buying them cool stuff.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Be respectful and considerate of those with different ideals and ideas from your own. After all, you may well learn something from them!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may have to defend yourself today against those who would assail you without real cause. The fact is, your critics may simply be jealous. As they should, you're prettier than they are.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may seem to know something today that others do not – and what you do with that knowledge can benefit many others as well as yourself.



VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You'll want to get to the bottom of a personal mystery today, and only a good friend can help you get through that one lasting barrier. So get yourselves some International Foods coffee and get to it!

Minutewomen in land of the Crimson

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Willie Nelson couldn't wait to get on the road again, but whether the Massachusetts women's soccer team collectively feels the same way is up in the air.

The Minutewomen have, in fact, not been "on the road" during the regular season since a late October trip in 2000 that resulted in two overtime contests. UMass fell to Dayton in the first matchup 2-1, despite a strong showing by goalkeeper Julie Podbrasky. The Maroon and White tied Xavier 1-1 in the second game of the road trip.

Overall, UMass was 2-4-1 on the road last season. Despite the recent troubles away from Totman Field, this trip isn't as far as Ohio, New York or Philadelphia. A two-hour bus ride will get the Minutewomen to their destination this afternoon.

With a trip down the Mass. Pike, and a few turns thereafter, coach Jim Rudy's players will find themselves in Crimson territory, on Harvard's campus.

It isn't the trip that worries Rudy. It is Harvard's team size and abilities. After concentrating on New Hampshire's size heading into last Friday's game at Totman, Rudy is even more worried about the Crimson's distinct height advantage.

"If we thought UNH was big," Rudy said, "this team is bigger through more players. They are big all over the field."

With a decisive 3-0 win over the Wildcats on Friday – the team's first shutout – the team proved that giving up some height isn't a problem. Not that it makes Rudy feel much better.

"This will be our toughest game of the year to date," Rudy said. "We hope it compares [to the UNH game] in that they were big. These kids can move a little bit. We didn't find UNH to be that quick."

Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, all-conference midfielder Brooke Bartlett has aggravated an ankle injury she originally suffered in the preseason. The decision to play Bartlett will be a tough game-time decision for Rudy. This is, after all, a player that dramatically changes the way an opposing team plays defense against the Maroon and White.

"Without [Brooke] on the field, that takes a lot of the pressure we can put on the other team off the field," Rudy said.

In the September 23 match against Rhode Island, Ram coach Geoff Bennett changed his entire scheme to focus on stopping Bartlett, resulting in a 3-1 UMass win with three different Massachusetts players scoring on the URI defense.

With a size advantage and a speed that UMass didn't have to deal with against New Hampshire, along with a banged up superstar, everyone involved expects a very competitive match.

"It is going to be a case of who blinks first and who gets the last goal," Rudy said.

UMass's Ptah Myers battles for possession in the Minutemen's thrilling overtime loss to Rhode Island

Rammed in overtime

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

In the classic Harrison Ford flick Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom, there is a scene that shows the leader of the satanic group that Jones is chasing, digging his fingers through the skin of one of the worshippers' chest, and physically ripping the beating heart out of this man's body for everyone around to witness.

Saturday at Totman Field, University of Rhode Island forward Patrick Rooney emotionally ripped the heart out of the Massachusetts men's soccer team [4-3, 0-1 A 10] when he fired a shot through the net in double-overtime to defeat the Minutemen 3-2 for all the UMass fans to see.

In the 111th minute of a tightly played match following a miscommunication in the UMass box, Rooney broke free of the defense and netted a shot past the outreached arms of Minuteman goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn, giving UMass it's first loss at home this season.

"There obviously was some kind of miscue because a man was open," Head Coach Sam Koch said. "Those type of things should not happen."

Saturday's match against the Rams [4-1, 1-0 A 10] was the Maroon and White's first taste of Atlantic 10 play this season. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, they had to begin their intra-conference schedule against the squad that is predicted to finish Number One in the A-10.

"They are favored to be the Number One team in the conference for a good reason," Koch said of the Rams. "They showed it today."

Massachusetts showed throughout most of the game that it could hang with the Rams but was outplayed towards the end of the match.

Things looked great early when junior forward Jeff Deren continued his offensive explosion this season and put in the first goal of the game for UMass, making the score 1-0 in the 17th minute. Sophomore forward Yuri Morales came up with the unlikely assist when he took a shot from the right side of the box and missed wide to the left. Fortunately for the Minutemen, the feisty Deren was able to recover the ball and put it past Rams goalkeeper Michael Charles, giving him his sixth goal of the season.

"He is a dangerous goal scorer," Koch said of his leading goal scorer. "He can get the ball at his feet at the 18-yard box and put it away."

Coming into Saturday's affair with Rhode Island, UMass keeper O'Quinn had come off two consecutive shutouts – at New Hampshire 2-0 and at home versus Maine 7-0.

He continued his stellar play against the Rams. It took 76 minutes for URI to counter and tie the game up at one when Rams freshman Sasha Gotsmanov shot one past the senior captain and ended O'Quinn's 300-minute shutout streak.

O'Quinn finished the day with six saves on 22 Rhode Island shots.

UMass rebounded and was able to regain the lead ten minutes later when an unlikely assassin appeared. Reserve forward Max Wolf sneaked away from the URI defense, gained control of the ball at the top of the box and nailed a shot from straight away past the URI goalkeeper, making the score 2-1 with 3:30 minutes left in the match.

Wolf's teammates piled on the senior following the clutch goal, but the celebration might have been a little premature.

In almost a blink of the eye, the Rams were able to knot up the score once again, this time with a little help from a questionable call by the refereeing crew.

Just sixteen seconds after the second UMass goal, URI senior midfielder Dennis Richards was able to draw a penalty in the UMass box. This led to a penalty shot by forward Gareth Elliot and he capitalized on the free shot as he fired the ball to the left while O'Quinn went right – knotting the score again. The goal by Elliot sent the match to overtime.

"Let's just say [the ref's] made some mistakes but so did we," Koch remarked. "If we put all our chances in and played perfectly, we would never have to worry about a referee.

"In the second half I don't think we played well because they took it to us," Koch added. "We didn't defend like we needed to and we made major mistakes that cost us."

In the first extra session, the Minutemen put the pressure back on the Rams defense. They were able to produce four corner kicks in the period. Unfortunately they did not execute the planned plays to perfection. The Minutemen were unable to get the goal that would give URI sudden death.

Five minutes into the second overtime, Rooney gave Massachusetts its sudden death as he concluded the game with a rifling shot through the UMass posts.

"They are big and strong," Koch said. "I think we can beat them, we just did not do it today."

Musketeers slice and dice UMass

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

In any battle, a side with stronger, more plentiful weapons will generally come away victorious.

This was certainly the case in Friday's match between the Massachusetts volleyball team and visiting Xavier, as the Musketeers used a strong multi-faceted attack to upend the Minutewomen in straight sets (30-24, 30-14, 30-28).

Four players posted 12 kills for Xavier (8-1 overall, 2-1 Atlantic 10) and only one of them made more than two errors in the match to lead the Musketeers to an impressive .296 team hitting percentage.

Freshman setter Molly Martin posted 46 assists in the three-game victory.

The first game of the match saw the two teams neck-and-neck out of the gates. With the Maroon and White holding a 14-13 lead, senior Amanda Lang threw down one of her 12 kills to spark a four-point rally for the visitors that was snuffed out when sophomore Nitia Small brought the Minutewomen within three at 18-15.

With the score at 20-15 Xavier, senior Lauren Vander Veen made a key block on junior Katey Wygant to light a fire under the Minutewomen.

With freshman Michelle Spaleta serving, UMass ran off three more consecutive points to again draw the Minutewomen within one. But sophomore Kimberly Cockerel came on strong with three kills in the game's waning moments to propel the visitors to a 30-24 first game victory in which they hit at a .277 clip.

The second game was all Xavier from the get-go, as senior Jill Hampton put home three kills in a row to begin the match. After a Martin ace, Cockerel and senior superstar Sara Bachus knocked down consecutive kills of their own to get the Musketeers out to a 6-0 advantage.

From there, it was back and forth, as UMass tried in vain to claw its way back into the match. After making three errors in four plays, the Minutewomen found themselves in a 16-8 hole, which was momentarily relieved by an impressive Vander Veen block.

However, it was not enough to get the offensive woes out of the Maroon and White's system, as the Musketeers used an amazing .471 hitting percentage, compared to UMass's .000, to post a decisive 30-14 win.

Game Three was by far the best contest of the match, but again UMass found itself in an early hole. Bachus and Wygant combined for four kills in five points to put Xavier up 8-4 early.

But two Xavier errors combined with a kill by senior co-captain Lymarie Llovet and a key block by junior Jitka Stehnova brought the Minutewomen to within one point at 9-8.

However, Small made key errors on consecutive plays for the Maroon and White and Wygant tallied an ace for the visitors to make the count 12-8, Xavier. The two teams jockeyed back and forth, but with the score 18-14 Musketeers, the Minutewomen mounted a comeback as multiple errors by the visitors brought the home squad to within two at 19-17, and prompted a Xavier timeout.

After the break, a tremendous volley ensued between the two sides, with both teams refusing to give an inch. Finally, an attempted Hampton kill went awry, causing raucous applause from the spectators. Another Llovet block brought the crowd to its feet and the home team found itself in a 19-19 deadlock.

After neck-and-neck play over the next several points, the score stood at 27-27. Lang then threw down an impressive kill on the next play, and followed that up by serving up an ace to put her squad on the brink of victory at 29-27. Llovet would follow that up with a kill, but it was not enough. On the following play Hampton and Wygant combined to finish the match with a stellar block to gain the 30-28 triumph.

Lang and Hampton each posted double-doubles in the match, tallying 12 kills apiece and 15 and 10 digs, respectively. Nitia Small led a lackluster Maroon and White offensive effort with nine kills on the match, as the Minutewomen only hit at a .143 clip for the three-game set.

Water polo continues tidal wave over nation

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Correspondent

The No. 13 Massachusetts men's water polo team enjoyed a very successful weekend in Princeton, N.J. at the North/South Classic. Victories over George Washington, Bucknell and Navy helped the Maroon and White to a 3-1 mark, with the loss coming to 12th-ranked Princeton in a tough overtime battle.

In the first game of the weekend tourney, the Minutemen [14-2] dominated George Washington, 14-3. Junior Ricardo Puig led the scoring with three goals, and seniors Mike Foley, Carlos Ramos and junior Andre Nyce each contributed two goals to the victory.

In the second game against Bucknell, the story was about the same, with different characters chipping in for the final score of 14-5. Foley again found the net twice, as did senior Adam Moore, junior Justin Houck and freshman Adam Zobler.

The Saturday evening game was a fierce battle between two ranked teams. Scoring was minimal throughout regulation time, with three goals to each team in the first period and two each in the third, sending the game into OT. In the extra set, Princeton edged the Minutemen 2-1 to make the final score 7-6.

"We followed the game plan well, but it's early in the season, and in overtime we couldn't put the rock in the net," said Head Coach Russ Yarworth, disappointed in the final result but still content overall with the weekend. "We played the first two games according to plan, and I'm pleased with our progress defensively."

The Maroon and White showed plenty of resilience in bouncing back from the Princeton loss, defeating Navy 7-4 on Sunday. Goalie J.R. VanderWall was solid with 14 saves, bringing him to 33 saves in the 13 periods the Minutemen played on the weekend. After what Coach Yarworth called "a momentary lapse" in which the Midshipmen netted two goals in rapid fashion to tie the game at 4-4, UMass took over in the fourth quarter and scored three to get the win. Senior Greg Trayer scored two in the effort, and Moore also chipped in with a goal and two assists.

Yarworth highlighted the play of sophomore Tim Craycraft, who he said, "started the counter-attack that led to [Junior] Justin [Houck]'s winning goal." The coach was also happy that he was able to get some time for the bench players.

"It was nice to get some of the other kids a chance to get in the water," Yarworth said.

Up next for the squad are league opponents Iona, Queens and Brown in Providence, R.I. next weekend. Yarworth tabbed the Queens game as being crucial to the season, saying that the upcoming league games are of "paramount importance."

UMass faces Iona and Queens on Saturday, and wraps up the weekend with Brown on Sunday.

Another on-campus mug-ing to protect the environment

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is now available in mug form.

The Office of Waste Management (OWM) and Dining Services are co-sponsoring a program intended to reduce the amount of disposable cups in the University's trash.

The mugs feature the UMass logo and the Minuteman, who reminds students that "Only U Can Prevent Waste."

"That's the message. It's not too complicated," OWM General Manager John Pepi said. "Hopefully it will catch on."

A similar program at the University of Wisconsin at Madison sold over 35,000 mugs and saved 400,000 Styrofoam cups, Pepi explained. Dan Yagudin, a senior Economics major, came up with idea for UMass' own U-Mug.

"I just saw cups being wasted. People drink and then throw them away. At the University of Wisconsin they saved almost half a million cups," said Yagudin, who works for OWM. "We use both paper and Styrofoam, but why waste it when you can use reusable ones?"

And UMass uses a great deal of paper and polystyene cups.

"You can look at the trash stream coming out of the fast food places in the Campus Center and it's loaded with cups," Pepi said.

The U-Mug project has been in the works for some time, Pepi said, but that the real key was getting students to use them.

"It's been a year or so in the making," Pepi said. "We had heard of it, but we've been working since the spring on it."

The mugs are on sale in the Campus Center and in the Hampden convenience store, and available in 16-ounce and 22-ounce sizes. As a further incentive to students to use the reusable containers, Dining Services is offering a discount to students who use the U-Mug.

SCOTT ELDRIDGE II/COLLEGIAN

SCOTT ELDRIDGE II/COLLEGIAN

Students can fill up their U-Mugs with coffee at the Franklin, Worcester and Hampden convenience stores and Hampden, Whitmore, and Physical Plant snack bars at a discounted price. The 16-ounce cup can be filled for 99 cents and the 22-ounce mug can be filled for $1.09.

The Office of Waste Management wanted the cups to be made from recycled materials, which posed a problem.

"We wanted recycled content in the cups, and only a few companies could do that," Pepi said. "Only a handful could customize it and put the logo on it. They have the new logo, for people who want to broadcast that they go to UMass. The other side has the Minuteman character, who we have been cultivating as a Smokey the Bear – only you can prevent waste."

The program is one of several undertakings by the OWM to rid the campus of disposable utensils, cups, and plates.

"We've been experimenting with biodegradable utensils. This is a part of the whole proposal. We're talking about cuts on storage and costs. Michigan sold 35,000 mugs," Pepi said. "The gist of the thing is that we want to provide an incentive for students to stop using disposables."

Yagudin hopes this program will be as successful as previous programs, such as the Battery Recycling Program. His freshmen year Yagudin suggested that OWM set up collection points for batteries, rather than the previous system of mailing batteries to the recycling center.

The success of that program got Yagudin a job.

"At the time I was a student with an idea. Now I work there," Yagudin said. "You start a small program here and even though it's huge university, you can have an impact."

Economy shadows fair

By William Larkin
Collegian Correspondent

Undaunted by a flagging economy and the events of Sept. 11, the Campus Career Network began its fifth annual Engineering Career Fair yesterday afternoon in the Gunness Student Center of Marcus Hall.

On the first session of the three-day event, which lasts from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. each day, recruiters from 22 engineering companies, including Compaq, Travelers and IBM, accepted resumes and informed applicants about internship, co-op and career opportunities.

"We're looking for those people who will become the future of our company," said Laura Schoeder, a recruiter from BOSE, an audio engineering corporation.

The potpourri of recruiters at yesterday's session represented fifteen computer engineering companies, four military and civil engineering companies, two biotechnology companies, and one intellectual property company. They sponsored booths decorated with informational pamphlets, company gifts, and colorful graphics advertising to approximately 200 students dressed in suits and ties.

According to Schoeder, this year BOSE will attend similar fairs at 20 campuses across the U.S. to hire 16-18 college graduates, including students with bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees. Schoeder said the engineering industry "is doing quite well," and her colleagues across the country "are eager to fill engineering slots with new hires."

Despite the optimism displayed by recruiters at the fair, several students expressed doubt concerning their chances in the workforce.

Yuri Prou, a senior Computer Systems Engineer, does not believe his attendance at the fair will attain him a job when he graduates in the spring. Prou said because several of the companies represented at the fair fear America's economic future, they will only hire applicants with years of field experience and a history of stellar academic performance.

Although he said the terrorist attacks have not effected his chances at finding work, "companies are still holding back, and that means less talking and less opportunities."

Heather Mills, a senior Computer Systems Engineer, shared Prou's pessimism but still hopes to find work when she graduates. Mills, who left resumes with 8-10 recruiters, including military defense companies such as Raytheon and NAVSEA, said the pending war may revive the economy in time for her to enter the job market. While the economy "is not in a recession yet, the signs are not good," she said. "Some companies, like Compaq, will tell you that there are no jobs available."

Unlike many students attending the fair, Economics professor James Crotty said that the U.S. has "certainly entered a recession."

The economy had experienced two fiscal quarters of negative growth prior to Sept. 11 and will continue to shrink after the terrorist attacks, forcing cutbacks in the telecommunications, airline and financial industries, Crotty said.

Despite last month's rise in national unemployment from 4.5 to 4.9 percent and the threat of further terrorist attacks, Joan Stoia, director of the career network, says she expects 88 companies to attend the fair. According to Stoia, only two recruiters, including a representative from the California Department of Transportation, have cancelled their appearances due to a fear of flying.

While Stoia admitted that the airline industry plans to layoff approximately 80,000 employees following the terrorist attacks, and the semiconductor industry has cut nearly 20,000 jobs since the dot-com crash earlier this year, she said that the engineering industry will not suffer. Commodity suppliers, such as those in the burgeoning pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries, continue to search for new employees, Stoia said.

According to Stoia, business cycles "boom and bust" over a much shorter time span today than they did 20 years ago. Therefore, new industries enter the market as others collapse, supplying students with job opportunities in fields they may not have expected to enter, Stoia said.

"The market is like a forest – you have new growth and old growth. The focus of my job this year is to develop a personal relationship with recruiters to match students with what's available out there for work."

Students, faculty, administration, and recruiters looking for further information about the fair can call Clark Edwards at 545-6251, or visit the career network's web site at http://www-ccn.acad.umass.edu/.

Select Board debates flags, Route 9 traffic

By Nathan Jones

Flag Controversy Continues, Residents Ask For Cohesive Policy

At the Oct. 1 meeting of the Amherst Select Board, town resident John Knowles took advantage of the Board's question and answer period to bring before the Board a concern he had that a formal policy had not been adopted regarding 29 American Flags being flown downtown.

The 29 flags had been flying on a trial basis until they were removed at Town Manager Barry Del Castilho's order amidst controversy on Sept. 10. The very next day, in light of the terrorist attacks, the flags were restored to their original positions to be flown for 30 days in accordance with the congressional resolution, which governs all Federal buildings. Knowles, however, felt that being guided by this is insufficient. The issue of the town lacking its own policy, he said, is one which "greatly concerns me and many others who are afraid to speak. If this was a natural disaster no one would have seen this kind of national unity, and unity, by the way, is a code word for war."

Select Board Chair Carl Seppala cautioned that the public hearing on the flag issue has now been closed, and that the Board had already received all the feedback from the public it required. However, he expressed his belief that there is no reason for the Board not to form its own clearly worded policy as to when the flags will come down, to be flown again on special holidays and occasions. "What happened personally impacted many in our town," he said, "We would be acknowledging their loss."

Board member Anne Awad lent her "reluctant support," to the policy idea, which makes it clearly stated that the flags will remain up, augmenting the town's eight permanent flags, until after Veteran's Day. Fellow member Eddy Goldberg also cautiously gave the idea the thumbs-up, saying "Less harm will be done leaving them up than taking them down at this point."

In the end, the policy was unanimously passed, and before leaving Knowles also asked the Board to consider drafting a resolution to send to Washington condemning the use of military force. This matter, however, was not discussed.

Light to Improve Route 9 Traffic

The intersection of Route 9, Old Farm Road, and Gate House Road is going to receive some long-awaited improvements comprised of the addition of a sidewalk, a traffic light, and a bus turn-around. Town Engineer Dan Delasky gave the Amherst Select Board a presentation on the details of the project at their Oct. 1 meeting.

Delasky began by giving background on the project. In the early 1990s, he said, the safety concern in light of rising Route 9 traffic was first raised. However, efforts to install a traffic light then failed, because the Federal government establishes conditions, or "warrants" which must be met in order to install such a system. More recently, however, growth in nearby subdivisions has lead to the warrants finally being met. So, the town

Seminar to be held on war against terrorism

In yet another effort to contemplate the horrific tragedy of Sept. 11, Math Professor Melvyn Berger will be the discussant of a seminar on counter terrorism today at 2:00 p.m. in the Lederle Graduate Research Center, room 1634.

All faculty and students are encouraged to join in the conversation and help think constructively about the war on terrorism. "This is a shocking situation," Berger said. "We're looking for constructive ideas from students to counter these terrible things that are being done."

Among the subtopics that will be discussed are chemical and biochemical warfare, and methods to prevent airplane hijacking.

"I'm looking to find an antidote for our planes running into big skyscrapers," Berger said. "I'd like to invent an electro-magnetic shield.

"I'd like to talk about biochemical difficulties [at the seminar]. We're going to study what was done in the past, since there were problems with [biochemical] warfare going back as far as the 18th century."

The seminar is free and open to the public, and there will be tea following it. For more questions please contact Professor Berger at 546-1027.

Orchard Hill Bowl Dance site of arrests

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

Several students were arrested in violation of liquor laws and various disturbances this weekend.

On Sept. 28, while on patrol in Southwest, officers observed two passengers exit a car and proceed to remove bottles of alcohol from the trunk and place them in a backpack. The individuals, Stacey Dorale, 19, of Stoughton, Mass. and Erin E. Maroney, 19, of Shrewsbury, Mass., were charged with underage transporting of liquor, according to Jim Lyons, Associate to the Director of Public Safety.

Officers at the Orchard Hill Bowl observed two individuals drinking 12-ounce cans of beer. Joshua H. Gmeiner, 19, of Groton, Mass. and Jonelle M. Waterman, 20, of Gilmanton, N.H. were charged with underage possession of liquor, said Lyons.

Three individuals were arrested Sept. 28 for acting in concert, according to Lyons. Michael J. Meagher, Jr., 20 of Andover, Mass., Trevor A. Crispo, 19 or Sudbury, Mass. and Patrick McCabe, 19 of Andover, Mass. were each charged with two counts of destruction of property over $250. An officer saw one of them kick the driver's side mirror off of a car.

Lyons reported that on Sept. 29 at the Orchard Hill Bowl, Steven Michael Shaw, 19, Norfolk, Mass., was seen by officers opening a book bag and handing out beer to others. While processing the arrest, police officers found a Class D substance. Shaw was charged with possession of a Class D substance and underage possession of liquor.

Kathryn Harrington-Howes, 21 of Darien, Conn. was stopped at 3:30 a.m. by an officer on patrol traveling southbound on Commonwealth Avenue for swerving over double yellow lines marked on the road. The officer detected a strong odor of alcohol on Harrington-Howes and administered a field sobriety test. After her inability to satisfactorily perform the test, she was arrested and charged with operating under the influence. She was later given a breathalyzer test, said Lyons.

Fadner J. Pierre, 22 of West Harwich, Mass. was arrested on Sept. 28 after he was stopped by a police officer for excessive speed. After a routine check, it was found that Pierre's driver's license had expired in June 2001, reported Lyons.

SGA orients itself, preps for debut Senate meeting

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The newly elected Student Government Association's Senators met this Monday and Tuesday for an SGA orientation in preparation for this evening's first Senate meeting.

Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders and Associate Speaker Bill Powers led Senators through the rules and procedures of the Senate. Senators were then given the chance to express any concerns as well as ask questions prior to tonight's meeting.

Saunders and Powers both expressed the need for student involvement within the Senate in order to make positive changes at the University of Massachusetts.

"You're here to represent the student body and lead them, and you need to be able to vote and understand what's going on for your constituents," Powers said.

Saunders continued by stressing the need for positive Senator and Administrative relationships. Issues between the Administration and the Senate have been a problem over the previous years; however, Saunders explained that it goes both ways.

"After tonight's Senate meeting we're going to be setting up meetings with the Administration so the Senators can get a chance to discuss issues with them, as well as the Administration can bring issues to the Senators," Saunders said.

Aside from Saunders and Powers, the members of the Senate expressed how they plan to make changes within the Senate as well as the student body.

Saunders explained his main goal was tackling parking issues whereas other members expressed the need for changes in areas such as safety on campus, crosswalks and the overall view of the SGA.

"I have a few personal issues that I would like to work out with the Senate," Commuter Senator Robert Chirwa said. "I know of a few crosswalks off-campus that people fear crossing, and as pedestrians we have the right of way, and this is not right."

Other members continued by expressing that they are looking to bring forth a new outlook for the Senate and campus.

"I hope to bring some fresh new ideas to the Senate that they haven't seen before," Southwest at-large Senator Blake Kleppe said. "I haven't seen how it's been run in the past, but I'm hopeful that we'll have a great year. I believe our leadership is working to the best of their abilities to move on."

As the Senate orientation came to a close, members of the SGA expressed their enthusiasm for the first meeting of the Senate.

"I think that the orientation was good and gave everyone a glimpse at what the Senate is like," Chirwa said. "But the best experience is the Senate meetings when everyone comes together."

The SGA Senate meeting will come together tonight at the top of the Campus Center at 7:15 p.m.

applied to MassHighway and was granted permission for a traffic light installation. MassHighway, through consultants, prepared the plans for it, for which the town paid $80,000. The remaining estimated $400,000 cost of actually installing the traffic light will be paid by MassHighway. Delasky also noted that the system is "fully actuated," which means sensors will detect when traffic is waiting at Old Farm or Gatehouse Roads, and the light for Route 9 traffic will not turn red unless there is.

The Select Board gave unanimous approval to the project, which has also been signed off on by the police and fire chiefs as well as the Planning Director. The project must go out under public bidding law, where all interested contractors can enter competing estimates. The contract is then given to the lowest qualified bidder. It is anticipated that this process will begin in the spring.

Board member Dolly Jolly expressed her support for the improvement, describing how she takes deliberate effort to avoid the area as it is now and saying "There's no point in the day when it is easy to get across that intersection. It's hard to see traffic coming over the bridge, and you have to make decisions pretty quickly."

UMass Cuts Again

Consumer Studies Department feels the burden

Students needs? Not much of a priority at the University of Massachusetts.

In a recent study done on UMass, it was found that the school spends less money on education than other schools in the area and spends more on athletics and non-academic costs. Aaron Lazare, the study's author, suggested to the University that it reprioritize and adjust the budget toward student needs.

But in usual fashion, the University continued to implement poor decision-making processes and finalized the plans to close out the Consumer Studies Department. The decision, which the faculty senate opposed last May and which was protested by a number of students within the department, was made in light of the campus facing a second round of budget cuts. UMass took steps to hack the department last year when it eliminated the Apparel Marketing program leaving 240 students in a dying major with promises that everyone would be able to complete their degree by the year 2002. This promise seems impossible to fulfill, seeing as how the department had been consistently losing faculty throughout the past five years. Professors who either retired or left the campus for other reasons have not been replaced or rehired, rapidly depleting faculty available to teach classes. The four remaining faculty members who do exist are in the process of being transferred to different departments.

Why the University targeted Apparel Marking at all left a number of people at a loss as well as to why the University would choose to eliminate Consumer Studies. The Apparel Marketing major at UMass was a highly lauded program, the only one of its kind in New England. Students graduating from the major had a high job placement rate and the major itself only needed $240,000 to remain in working order. This is nothing compared to the sports programs at UMass, which are draining the University of $11.3 million dollars of our own funds as compared to the $3 million standard at other New England schools.

Once again UMass made a big mistake in budget cuts. In the first round of budget cuts the school left devastated programs like English as a Second Language in its wake and cut Spanish to 75 percent of its previous working order. This round we lost an entire department. We as a school are finally realizing that education has taken a back seat to athletics, funding for financial aid due to higher than average tuition costs and other non-academic funding needs.

Perhaps the school should take Lazare's advice and hire consultants or at the very least show some accountability for their past spending decisions and choices in the future. Rather than shave more dollars off of the already suffering departmental budgets the school should take a long hard look at where the money goes and make some new decisions.

UMass needs to shed "party-school" image?
Community needs to shed its image of us

SAM WILKINSON

Dr. Aaron Lazare, the Chancellor of the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester, thinks UMass-Amherst needs to work harder to get rid of our "party-school" image.

He said we're "rude, rowdy and often destructive to [our] environment." He added that, "[we] don't know how much [we're] paying for that perception."

Kiss it Lazare.

It isn't bad enough that we have the eastern end of the state constantly suggesting that we're nothing more than boozehounds. Now we've got our own administrators seconding it. Lazare apparently spoke with 100 individuals from the UMass community – students, faculty, administrators and community members – in coming to his conclusions. I've had a hell of a time figuring out who was on Lazare's committee. Nobody seems to know what students and what community members were on this advisory board.

So I don't know for sure, but I can certainly guess.

The students who'd legitimately come forward and suggest that UMass has a drinking problem would themselves have to be non-drinkers. They'd have to be concerned about UMass enough to volunteer. They'd have to be the type of people who simplistically blame their peers for the bigger problems of the world. In other words, the only group that could have possibly volunteered such an idiotic explanation of our problems as a University would be the Orchard Hill Commonwealth College students.

Is anybody more disgusted by a casual student with a casual attitude towards classes than people whose idea of an exciting Friday night involves a floor-wide Snood tournament? Oh sure, they do kegstands...of Diet Mountain Dew. I heard one kid once funneled a Dr. Pepper off the sixth floor. These are not a group of individuals who go out on the weekends and enjoy themselves.

What of those community members? They'd have to be locals who've lived here long enough to make ill-informed and ignorant decisions about the UMass community. They'd have to be bitter, mean, pathetic and spiteful. In other words, it could have been anyone from the local community.

The Town of Amherst hates UMass. It has constantly ignored the fact that UMass underpins the town's entire economy. Without students and professors, Amherst doesn't have the same quaint number of quaint establishments. They'd be out of business because they'd be out of our money. But has that realization ever stopped locals from pointing towards UMass and blaming us for their problems? Of course not.

I've said it before and I'll say it again: Amherst wants Amherst College and doesn't want UMass. It's that simple. We're a lower class and we bring less notoriety to the town than AC does. Hadley got Mount Holyoke, Northampton got Smith. The nearby hinterlands got Hampshire College. Amherst got Amherst College and us. They don't think it's fair and as such they make the same ridiculous complaint against us: we party too much. Of course, depending on the climate, we also park too much, we drive too much and we break the law too much.

"UMass is probably the first school in the history of education to think that cutting majors was the best possible solution to our chronic lack of funding. Nobody can get a class because UMass doesn't offer "classes" anymore, only spots to hopeful contestants in the education lottery"

The biggest problem with Lazare and the cronies who oozed their way onto his committee is that they have simplistically looked for the easiest complaint to make and then made it.

Saying that "well, we party too much" and then slapping our foreheads for not thinking of such an obvious problem earlier isn't a solution to the problems facing UMass. Lazare might want to believe UMass is paying a heavy price for the occasional boozing done by the student body, but our University has serious problems because we don't have any money.

If our own town, and our administrators don't like our existence, the state legislature apparently doesn't really know that we exist. While many state schools took advantage of the recent economic boom with new buildings, new fund drives, new attempts to bring in money, UMass simply sat. While students at some schools have "nice" student unions and great facilities for the time they don't spend in class, the UMass administration has done nothing to make our school better.

No new buildings.

No improvements.

No capital spending that is obvious to anybody.

No recreational facilities, unless somebody wants to count the swimming facilities available at the campus pond, and I don't.

How could the administration provide anything for the student body? We don't have any money. The last new building we got is a horrid-looking glass and steel building on the corner of our campus that nobody has any access too. UMass is probably the first school in the history of education to think that cutting majors was the best possible solution to our chronic lack of funding. Nobody can get a class because UMass doesn't offer "classes" anymore, only spots to hopeful contestants in the education lottery.

The real problem facing UMass is our total lack of money, of ends, of bling-bling, of ice, of cash, of bills. If our school had the appropriate funding it needed to educate nearly 25,000 students, individuals like Lazare wouldn't be able to make a career out of declaring that our student body drinks a few too many beers every Friday.

It's fairly easy to be dismissive of somebody like Lazare. While he could have come out and made a strong statement about the abominable treatment our campus gets at the hands of the legislature, he turned around and fingered the one group who can't do anything about the condition that our campus is in: us.

That the community and certain students joined the cry isn't surprising; it's that such a large group of individuals could put such a small amount of thought into their final statement.

FINANCING AN EMPIRE

WILLIAM LARKIN

Although the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF) protesters continue to criticize these organizations to promote egalitarianism and global social justice, the crusade of these dreadlock zealots has lost momentum over the past two years. The derision flung at the anti-globalization movement by the mainstream media has undermined the confidence of this thought-stirring group, whose contributions help balance the American marketplace of ideas. Therefore, both to soften public critique of their actions and observe a period of national mourning, the protestors postponed a planned rally in Washington on Sept. 29. However understandable their decision may be, the organizers of the protest lost a crucial opportunity to attract attention to America's global financial meddling through the mechanisms of the World Bank and the IMF.

In the weeks ahead, the Bush administration will probably push the World Bank and IMF to give loans to several impoverished middle-eastern nations, such as Pakistan, to ensure their military support in the "war on terrorism" and open their economic borders to foreign capital. Although the United Nations holds jurisdiction over both organizations, the U.S., the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Saudi Arabia and Japan control its actions. Of these nations, only Germany and Japan have not endorsed boundless action by the U.S., allowing them to dictate World Bank and IMF policy to the Middle East.

By indebting Islamic nations through World Bank and IMF loans, not only will the Bush administration arouse further attacks on America, but it will also extend its imperial grasp farther across the globe by harnessing more nations to its fiscal chariot. Although the loans given by these organizations help impoverished and developing countries for a few years, they cripple already fragile economies by forcing these nations to participate in "structural adjustment," when they cannot repay their debts. Borrower countries must adapt their politics to meet the demands of the World Bank and IMF; they must remove their trade and labor protections to encourage foreign investment in their economy. The World Bank and IMF forces these nations to reduce its budget deficit to reduce inflation, remove taxes on exports and imports, cater to the demands of foreign (American) corporations, privatize public sectors, devalue its currency to make its exports more competitive in world markets, ignore environmental protection laws, and raise interest rates.

According to the Center for Economic Justice, the World Bank and IMF's policies of structural adjustment have raped the southern hemisphere. In Mozambique, where laborers had processed native cashews for hundreds of years, the government levied a tax on the export of unprocessed cashews to protect one of the nation's few successful industries. But when Mozambique defaulted on their loans, the World Bank and IMF ordered the export tax removed. When corporations moved to export tax-insulated India to process the cashews, children working at home replaced 10,000 female factory workers from Mozambique.

The Campaign for Labor Rights and United Students Against Sweatshops has chronicled the flight of the Nike sneaker corporation, who has jogged from Taiwan to South Korea to Indonesia in search of penny wages. When Taiwan and South Korea started to encourage the creation of democratic unions, Nike moved from those countries to Indonesia, where a US-backed dictatorship has massacred thousands of East Timor refugees. Loans from the World Bank and IMF rewarded the Indonesian government for attracting foreign-owned countries with guaranteed cheap labor; armed military forces reprimanded workers who demanded adequate pay or threatened to unionize. When the currencies of several Asian countries plummeted in 1997, wages of the young Indonesian women producing Nike shoes dropped from $2.46 to $1 a day. When foreign bankers who had invested in the collapsed Asian economies sought help from the World Bank and IMF, the agencies loaned billions to Indonesia and other governments in exchange for more "structural adjustment."

The anti-globalization movement needs to learn that America has finished mourning, and that they must reschedule their protests in Washington as soon as possible. If they wait too long out of respect for America's grief, they will allow the U.S. to invite on itself a new round of terror, a backlash from the Middle East, victims of the subversive chaos of the World Bank and IMF.

If they wait too long out of respect for America's grief, they will allow the U.S. to invite on itself a new round of terror, a backlash from the Middle East, victims of the subversive chaos of the World Bank and IMF. If the U.S. authorizes these organizations to enslave Islamic nations with heavy loans, blowback from the economic, social, and environmental poverty encouraged by the invasive "structural adjustment" demands of the World Bank and IMF may dwarf the horrors generated on Sept. 11.

Taking a step back:
The crisis and the role of the university

We were in the White Mountains of New Hampshire a couple of weekends ago, trying to get away from the news and the noise of the previous week, enjoying the strength and solidity of the high peaks, when my girlfriend and I noticed something that we hadn't seen for a few days – a lone jet contrail against a crystal clear blue sky. To us, it was a small reminder that, slowly but surely, some sort of normalcy was returning to the world. However, that little sign hurling through space was also a piece of irony amidst the sea of American flags on practically every front yard, awning, auto antenna, motorcycle, and store front, that we encountered on our little trip up north. We could look to the sky, a place where fear had reigned only days before, for some illusion of comfort, while the landscape around us was awash in red, white, and blue colors raised in fear and anger.

CECIL LAWSON

Try as we did, there was no escaping from the consequences of the September 11th attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. As Americans, our sense of security has been shattered; any of us could have been on those planes, in those buildings, on those streets, and any large American city could have been attacked. There is a wound in our national psyche that won't heal just yet. And as we've all found out by now, the degrees of separation between us all have shrunk; if we weren't directly affected by the attacks, then we probably know someone who was, and that only feeds into our fear. The world has indeed gotten smaller, and all of the apostles of globalization are given pause.

As an academic community, we have offered up a variety of responses to these attacks, ranging from outrage and grief to caution and self-examination, a set of responses that mirrors those of the nation as a whole. Most people can look at a university and see only an ivory tower, set apart from the cares and troubles of the "real" world, and to an extent, this is the case. Universities around the country may have begun to adapt themselves to the needs of the Information age, and students may be choosing more practical majors in business and computers, but the university still remains a privileged space in American society. Here, we are insulated from the pressures of making a living and having to make decisions based upon sheer self-interest (although this seems to be less the case today, with more and more students having to work while attending school). This privileged time and space offer us many things, including the time to find our own identities, the time and resources to do research and create original knowledge, and the ability to take a step back from our customary prejudices and assumptions about the world.

"We should take great care with jumping headlong into any major event and with believing that the facts speak for themselves. This is particularly true with regard to the response to the attacks on American this past week."

It is to academics, intellectuals, and pundits that the American public turns when it needs background and context on the events that affect it most dearly. While the media may turn this knowledge into sound-bites and ultimately distort it, the university still has this role in a democratic society. Academics may often pimp themselves out to social movements and certain political viewpoints, but this does not change the duty that they have to provide the public with the knowledge that it needs and to do so conscientiously and with a reasonable degree of objectivity. Academics may indeed have value commitments, but until it can be established that values wholly determine facts, they may still indeed speak of the "facts" without harshly imposing any values on anyone.

It should be one of the sacrifices (or is it a privilege?) of being an academic or a university student to forgo involvement in the immediacy of the social and political life of her community. We should take great care with jumping headlong into any major event and with believing that the facts speak for themselves. This is particularly true with regard to the response to the attacks on American this past week. While there is nothing wrong with wanting to fly Old Glory out your window, or proclaim the need for "unity" in this country, or with wanting God to bless America in its time of crisis, there is something very wrong with believing a knee-jerk response to be the best and only response and with taking certain words and symbols for granted. Taking a step back from the fear, sense of vulnerability, and hurt may be more than can be asked of most people at this point in time, but it can and must be done if the university is to be a viable public institution in a democratic society.

How to succeed in college without really trying

Talking with some friends the other day about the devastating attack on the United States, this one fellow, seeking to enlighten us, and reveal the profundity of his erudition, suggested we may view the cruel bombing of the World Trade Center as a text. You know, a piece of paper with writing on it. This allows us to see this event from multiple angles: as text, this event is infinitely interpretable. Different perspectives – or perspectivism and perspectivity, but more on that later – can help us deconstruct the very ground on which we stand, collapsing the event that has just occurred, making it vanish, as it were, before our limited horizon. Actually, for the truly hip, the language is much more verbose than this, so that you may analyze this "text" from "multiple perspectivity" to "decenter" the "text" itself and "resituate" how we read it.

GEORGE THOMAS

Now you may have gathered, even those of you untutored in abstruse academic discourse, that those banding about such language either (1) don't know what the hell they're talking about and have little to contribute to a thoughtful discussion, or, discourse (more on this too) but bad language and opaque thought or, (2) are simply saying that we could see this tragedy in different ways, only saying it in pretentious way that calls forth ugly words to make the obvious seem obscure (and thereby deep). You'd be right on both counts. Still, being attuned to the rhythms of academic discourse will help you be a stunning academic success. And so, I thought I'd share these tine-tested techniques for success in the academy with you. Soon you too can be a heavy hitter and marvel your professors with your new lexicon.

1.) Say the word "text" a lot. Don't ever call your books books. Always call them texts. But don't limit yourself to the traditional book (that's a form of domination, which is bad). Everything is a text; call it so. What you're thinking, what you're seeing, actual occurrences, the kid next to you in class – it's all text. Speak of textuality, multiple texts, the intertextual, the intratextual, doing violence to the text, textual relations, or, even better, because it is clumsy and awkward, textual relationality. Always add a prefix or suffix if you can. Never ever use relational if you can use relationality. Don't ponder something, problematize it. Don't talk or discuss anything, engage in discourse. As with text, everything is a discourse in some way or another. And again, you're engaged in multiple discourses, you yourself are not a self, but a text which is engaged in never-ending multifaceted discourse. Offer a narrative, not a view or opinion. And say "subtext" instead of underlying meaning. Always look for the subtext, or subtextuality; it will show you're interested in the obscure and, you may as well learn now, the obscure is infinitely more interesting than the obvious. These three words – text, discourse, and narrative – are your basic tools. Use them indiscriminately and incoherently.

2.) Make the simple sound complex. You've probably already seen your professor and TA's doing this and now you can too. This will be easier to do with your three key words, but don't stop there. Be verbose; more words are always better than fewer words, bigger words are always better than smaller words, and foreign words are always better than English words. Don't worry so much about meaning and coherency – never ever be lucid when you can be obscure. Always use jargon. Pile epistemology on top of ontology until others wonder what you know and wish you didn't exist. This is the true mark of profundity. Like that sentence right there, the one you just read, it's far too lucid. Make it complex. Don't worry that you don't know what you're talking about, nobody does. If someone asks you to say it again, don't worry that you don't remember what you just said; nobody else does either. Plunge headlong. And don't worry about contradicting yourself—you're a fragmented self, a serious thinker, consistency isn't for you. If someone gives you a hard time, look at them like they're a naif. Never explain yourself: you're beyond discourse with philistines who don't get it.

3.) Name drop. This is the most well worn of all techniques. Don't say "technique" though, say "method" or "technology." But don't mean electronic gadgets, mean ways of doing things. You'll need some good names to begin with. You might start with Foucault, Derrida, and Barthes. Those aren't bad, but you're an achiever, you can do better. Try on Adorno, Lacan, Kristeva, and Irigaray. These will put you in the know. Dig up some other names, the more obscure the better. In fact, look for names that nobody else will know, that way you can look down on those who haven't heard of them. (So never read Shakespeare, watch trite popular movies and speak of how they subvert preconceived notions of hierarchy, study public toilets, or read about the economics of the anus). And again, don't worry about actually reading them, just stick to talking about them. Nobody else has read them either. It's probably best that you don't too. That would only limit what you can say about them. And if anyone happens to drop a name that you don't recognize, just smile ironically, roll you eyes, and with an airy wave of your hand, say, "so and so's sooooo passé." One hard rule here: avoid the British. They write lucidly and think clearly. Go for the French or the Germans.

"Ironic distance is the hallmark of a great mind. Smirk a lot, roll your eyes, cough while others speak, especially to the point – this is the sure mark of a simple mind."

4.) Remember, the author is dead. Even if he's not, speak of him that way. You're a critic, and critique is more valuable than creation—who cares what the writer thought? Your job is to come up with what he didn't know, to subvert his text. Only don't say he, especially if you're a he. Say she. Demand that others in your class do so too. Speak of gendered language. When writing use s/he and any other phrases that require complicated slashes. Don't stop there, because this leaves out the transgendered/transsexual/transvestite types. Trans is one of those prefixes you should use often.

5.) Posture. Don't love anything too much. Ironic distance is the hallmark of a great mind. Smirk a lot, roll your eyes, cough while others speak, especially simpletons who are lucid and to the point – this is the sure mark of a simple mind. Always equivocate; the world is complex – the more complex, the better. Density is your destiny. There is no truth, only text/discourse/narrative. But relax, smile about it. Nihilism is hip. There are no absolutes, unless it involves women, minorities, or the transgendered, in which case everything is absolute and clear as day. It's OK if you sound chillingly amoral when you reduce something as horrific as the loss of thousands of innocent lives to a "text." Remember, like the author, God is dead – so there's no morality. And always remember to say God is dead, not that he doesn't exist. That's a different text/discourse/narrative. Worried this is all meaningless, that it's one big game? Congratulations, you're on your way.

Bigger might be better

Nothing large ever started out that way. Shaquille O'Neal was once just a little embryo like the rest of us. That huge twenty-page term paper due at the end of last semester was once just a paragraph long assignment your evil professor conjured up in his head. Even the UMass administration was just one small group of people running for Massachusetts Agricultural College. And the same analogy is true for retail stores: none of them started out as a giant.

REGAN MCKENDRY

Be it K-Mart, McDonald's or Best Buy, each of these businesses started in one location providing their product to a limited group of people in the immediate area. As they prospered, it was the idea of their respective management to grow and spread, and thus you see the corporate conglomerates that stand today. I must be careful though. Heaven forbid that in the Amherst area the words "corporate" or "commercial" are uttered. Those are four letter words in this small town.

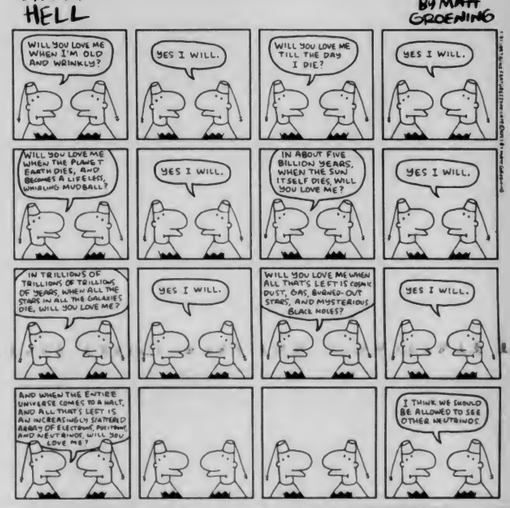
The latest business to come under fire is Barnes and Noble. The bookstore giant, which operates over 500 stores under its own name and nearly a similar amount of B. Dalton bookstores in malls, is opening a store up in the newly invigorated Mountain Farms Shopping Center on Route 9. Once dead, Mountain Farms is in the process of a revitalization that began with the addition of Wal-Mart a little over a year ago. Soon followed Old Navy and Linens 'N Things. Soon to arrive along with the new book warehouse is rumored to be new stores for the Gap and Michael's. Now what once was left for dead is alive and well and putting pressure on the Hampshire Mall to improve its offerings as well.

The reaction received in Amherst is, not surprisingly, one of disdain towards any corporation, blanketing all of them as evil. The common view around town is that large chains bully the little guy, remove creativity and offer no redeeming values to society. Critics elicit the examples of McDonald's and D'Angelo's, two businesses which attempted to operate in Amherst and failed.

What critics always fail to mention, though, is that each of those businesses that they despise, once started as a store not unlike Atticus or Antonio's. Barnes and Noble began as a single store in Wheaton, IL, operating out of Charles Barnes' home in 1873. It grew from there into what is seen today. There's a similar story for every major business in America. Wal-Mart faced numerous protests when it opened up its Hadley location. However many years ago it was nothing more than Sam Walton's general store in a small Arkansas town.

The large chains that dominate the landscape of our country are not there by accident though. No business has become a large chain by selling crappy merchandise and having lousy customer service. I have worked for one of the largest retailers in America for the last three years. (I won't say what store, as I don't want it to seem like I'm promoting them, however those of you who know me know exactly what store I mean.) The company operates over twice as many stores as does Barnes and Noble. However, each store is uniquely its own. My fellow employees are at the very least friends, and for many of us, our co-workers are almost like a family. We take a lot of pride in making sure that Store 2260 is special, even if to some it is only one out of over 1700. I'm sure the same can be said for other companies and their retail establishments.

The bookstores in Amherst, and other local businesses for that matter, survive and thrive because they do something special. They've earned customer loyalty by offering the best products and outstanding service. This will not change, no matter who comes to town. Critics like to cite McDonald's and D'Angelo's as examples of local resistance to brand name businesses, but in order to do so they must overlook the success of CVS, Bertucci's, Subway, Newbury Comics, and Starbucks, what some consider the beacon of the corporatization of America. These businesses thrive in uptown because they attract customers to come back again and again.



Businesses succeed for just as many reasons as they fail; there is no exception for large chains. Does everyone remember Jacinmere and Zayre's? These stores closed up a while ago because bad business practices had led customers to other competitors. When Wal-Mart opened up, people worried that local businesses would die due to the monster on Route 9. Yet last I checked there were few if any casualties due to Wal-Mart adding a location in our area. The same is said for the clothing stores that battle with Old Navy, the music stores that battle with Media Play and Newbury Comics, and this will also hold true for Atticus, Food For Thought, and all the other local bookstores that plan to challenge the behemoth known as Barnes and Noble.

There will be protests when Barnes and Noble opens up its new location. Undoubtedly though these people will fade away and retreat back to the local businesses that they support in town, leaving the corporate giant to do business with the rest of the world. And then the tiny little town of Amherst will return to normal until the Home Depot decides to open up shop.

On the job practice:
Why experience trumps the classroom

Theory is defined as "a hypothesis assumed for the sake of argument or investigation." This, my friends, is what every Communication class at the University of Massachusetts is based on. That's right, a hypothesis. Now let me be crystal clear on this fact: there is nothing wrong with learning about theory as long as you are learning the practice of the theory along with it. And that is not happening here.

ADAM DEYOUNG

The Communication department on this campus has hundreds of students enrolled in it, some of which want to make films when they leave. Others would like to write for newspapers or magazines. Still more want to be news anchors or DJ's. Will these students be successful? Some probably will. But will their success have anything to do with their major of choice here at UMass? Probably not. I could have just as easily been a business major and I would be in the same place I am today.

It is not just the practice of teaching theory that has me concerned. It is the lack of teaching the tools of the trade. Just six courses are being offered in the "practice" of communication: two for television and four for film in the upcoming spring semester. This is ridiculous. Now some may say that all of the Communication courses being offered are dealing with the practice of "communicating" and that may be true. However, it has been my experience from talking to other Communication majors that they are mainly interested in working in the Communication field that includes television, film, radio, newspapers, magazines and others.

I never like to bring forth a problem without a solution, and here it is. There are three very viable outlets for students to get the training they need to be successful in the communication field here on campus whose resources are sorely underused by the University: this newspaper, WMUA and UVC-TV 19. Sure, students who seek these groups out and get involved that way get a great education in that particular media, but there are students on campus who don't even know they exist. Why is it that we have three media outlets on campus that run as professional radio stations, television stations, and newspapers do, and we don't utilize them?

"There doesn't need to be a class that teaches you how to be a reporter. Just give the students who work for these media outlets credits for the work that they do."

Some members of the University community may tell you the reason they aren't utilized is that there is a lack of funding. Well, that is not a valid argument in my book. The reason being, these organizations already operate with very minimal University funding and if my memory serves me correctly, the Collegian with none. That being said, how much money does it cost to design a way for the students who work at these media groups to get credit?

There don't even need to be teachers to teach a class about radio or television. There doesn't need to be a class that teaches you how to be a reporter. Just give the students who work for these media outlets credits for the work that they do. If the University will not develop courses around these groups, at least acknowledge that the students who work there are getting valuable "real world" training, which they are not getting in the classroom.

Having worked for two out of the three organizations, I can tell you it is impossible to try and get credit for the work that you do. Just go to the Journalism or Communication departments and ask, you will clearly see how difficult it is.

So, I urge the University to develop some system so that all of the Communication and Journalism majors who work at WMUA, UVC, or the Collegian and those who desire to work there, can get credit for the work they do. For those students who want to get involved, do it, because it will be the most worthwhile experience you will ever have and it will definitely get you ready for the "real world."

Wasilik exhibit frames the past

By Martha Olivo
Collegian Correspondent

People have been trying to give the color purple its due for years. In sixth century Rome, purple was the color of royal gowns; historians say, to the high price of purple dye. However, one can feel certain that a high asking price for brown dye wouldn't have made mud-shade fit for a king.

More recently, Francine Pascal and her gang of ghostwriters had Jessica Wakefield, the bad-egg Sweet Valley twin, belonging to a hip club whose members were required to wear something purple every day. And even Mother Nature (no ghostwriters needed) seems to be waxing poetic about the royal color when she drops the sun from the sky and replaces it with a soft pink that yawns a purple streak before retiring for the night.

Jeanne Marie Wasilik carries on the tradition of purple celebration with her painting "Queen Omphale's Wardrobe," one work in a show entitled Tableaux Silencieux on display in the Central Gallery, Wheeler House, through Oct. 14. The collection on display has a mix of "after-works" – "After Cezanne," e.g. — that are tributes to the works of great artists past, and paintings of drapery.

Paintings of drapers?

Next to the after-works, all of which feature drapery in some form, the large paintings that take the drapes alone as their subjects are like selected close-ups, zoom-ins, if you will, of small but key elements in the after-works. By zooming in on the drapes, Wasilik has played up a significance that would otherwise go unnoticed, and in doing so has created provocative, vibrant, and sexy paintings that strike the viewer like a hot date, with their beauty, wit and intelligence.

Jeanne Marie Wasilik's "Sweet and Sour," on display in Central Gallery.

COURTESY CENTRAL GALLERY

The nature of drapery is very much a salient consideration in the contemplation of Wasilik's works. A curtain hangs between performers and their expectant audience; the sun is kept out of a sick man's room by a thick dark shade; a woman hides her body from an unexpected guest behind the drapery of her canopy bed. Thus, drapery is a barrier, sometimes barely tolerated, other times thankfully erected. Drapery is, as such, a witness to many acts, theatrical, scandalous and mundane. In her paintings, Wasilik captures and plays intelligently with these various aspects of drapery, all to the viewer's delight.

"Queen Omphale's Wardrobe" depicts a purple drape that flirts with its viewer, turning this way and that, all the while stunning in its purple audacity. Historically, (and Wasilik is an astute historian who makes effective use of her knowledge) Queen Omphale is better known as the woman to whom Hercules, that giant among men, was enslaved for three years. Omphale took great joy in dressing Hercules in women's clothing and forcing him to spin and weave.

Her wardrobe (whether the title refers to a clothing cabinet's curtain or to the clothing itself is unclear) as depicted by Wasilik, seems to take great joy in its role as the center of the painter's and viewer's attention. One can't help but think, as a result, of the wardrobe's role in its unseen environment, made off-limits to the viewer by Wasilik's decision to zoom in. Think of the drapery as a fly on Omphale's wall as she has her way with Hercules and it is no wonder the purple drapery giggles.

In another of the drapery works titled "Parlor Game," three curtains are depicted, one green and heavy and velvety soft, another tidy and yellow, the third a shiny purple. The soft green falls from an unseen rod outside the painting's perimeter, and drapes lazily over a rail that crosses the painting horizontally. Neatly attached to the same rod is the yellow curtain, uniformly gathered and hanging straight. Between the two, and with no visible connection to a hanger of any sort, the purple drape pokes out its face (or is that its toe?). The green and yellow curtains have the familiar contrast of the stereotypical married couple, the husband a big softy lounging about, his wife prim and proper, quiet and submissive. And their child is a purple prince, trying to find space among the established roles and personalities of his parents.

In a gallery talk that Ms. Wasilik gave at the show's opening, she spoke of her fear that people are losing the language to describe their feelings and reactions to the world and of her "missionary zeal" to help people recapture that ability. It is clear that, in painting, Wasilik has found her language for conveyance and reaction. And, with the production and display of such thought and emotion-provoking pieces, she may stimulate her audience, at the very least, to lust for the outlets she fears we may be losing.

King of Pop wants to regain the throne

Can Wacko Jacko make a comeback?

So goes one of the biggest questions of this year's entertainment world.

Jackson is in the process of an all-media assault that will culminate in his long-delayed Invincible comeback album, slated for an Oct. 30 release. "You Rock My World," his first single off the egotistically-titled album, which was supposedly "leaked" to radio, leads a long roster of promo material for the reclusive star. Jackson made a surprise appearance at the MTV Video Music Awards earlier this month alongside 'N Sync. His 30th Anniversary Celebration concerts drew some of today's biggest and best talent including the likes of Whitney Houston, 'N Sync, and Britney Spears (an edited version of which will air on CBS Nov. 2). The concerts also brought his brothers together for a highly anticipated Jackson 5 reunion. Jackson, along with a slew of other American recording artists, will also be recording "What More Can I Give" to benefit the victims of the Sep. 11 terrorist attacks. In addition, Jackson has released "Cry," a single off of Invincible, as a tribute to the victims of the recent tragedy. On Oct. 16 Sony Music will release the expanded versions of Off the Wall, Thriller, Bad, and Dangerous.

Is this an exceptional amount of publicity for one disc? It might be needed. The stakes are high for both Jackson and his label, Sony, which is reeling from disappointing releases from high profile artists like Ricky Martin and Jessica Simpson and a lack of new product from mainstays like Celine Dion and Lauryn Hill. That might explain why Sony has sunk a record-setting $50 million to produce the first Jackson album in seven years.

The eccentric star has taken far longer than expected to produce the album. Over three years have been spent on the creation of Invincible, where an estimated 50 tracks were recorded. Some of the most expensive producers in the business, including R. Kelly, Teddy Riley, and Rodney Jerkins, were recruited to produce the album where 16 of his best songs have been ultimately chosen for the final product. The delays frustrated many Jackson associates whose patience for Jackson's perfectionism grew wearily thin.

Needless to say, Sony wants to avoid another Blood on the Dance Floor, the 1997 dud that followed 1995's underwhelming HIStory lesson. (The latter sold just 1.4 million copies in the U.S., while Blood cleared a paltry 230,000.) Invincible reportedly infuses Jackson's sound with more commercial hip-hop elements; a formula Sony hopes will modernize Jackson's sound and lead to commercial success.

IS JACKSON 'INVINCIBLE'?

Even if Jackson's sound is in sync with modern tastes, will Sony be able to sell the 43-year-old singer to our "TRL" nation, many of whom were born before his 1982 landmark Thriller? And even if such an arduous task is attained, will there be any payoff considering the megabucks being poured into such a colossal comeback effort (the 14-minute video to "You Rock My World" reportedly cost $5 million)?

Many feel that if Jackson doesn't strike a chord with Invincible his future career will be over. Jackson's career took a nosedive in 1993, when he was investigated by Santa Barbara, Calif., police on charges that he had molested a then 13-year-old boy. No charges were lifted, but Jackson settled a civil claim out of court for an undisclosed, reportedly substantial sum ($15 million has been a popular figure in the press). Santa Barbara officials confirm recent tabloid reports that the case is still open, though the investigation has been suspended.

Unfortunately, molestation charges only tell part of the story. Jackson married and divorced Elvis Presley's daughter, Lisa Marie, and the unconventional relationship with his second wife, Debbie Rowe, who bore Jackson's two children, son, Prince, 4, and daughter, Paris, 3, also ended in divorce. And his penchant for wearing a surgical mask reveals one fact he can't hide: forever-endless visits to the plastic surgeon, which have transformed the King of Pop into the King of Shock.

So far, Sony has been successful in avoiding the charges, and turning the curiosity about the man into curiosity about the music. But are his days of attracting lurid headlines completely over?

AN INDOMITABLE LEGEND

As a singer, composer, producer, arranger and musician, Jackson is one of the most talented and influential artists in the history of recorded music. He is an artist whose music has impacted three generations. Although it has been years since his reign at the top and the focus has been on nothing but the controversy and the freak show, Jackson's fame and stature as one of the greatest entertainers is enormous.

Even if Jackson's latest work flops, his illustrious efforts to the entertainment world have changed pop culture forever. Jackson blew open the door for new African-American artists, revolutionized the music video, defied the laws of gravity with his trademark moonwalk dance and popularized the sequined glove. Thriller, which has sold over 50 million copies worldwide, has been referred to as one of the best albums of "Magnum." A word that strikes fear into the hearts of all men. This word is the name of the "movie" that Derek Zoolander has been trying to perfect for over a year, and, when I finally saw it, I thought I had found nirvana.

Well, not really.

I saw Zoolander Sunday night, as a sort of prize for being able to get all my assignments done this weekend. I also needed something to soothe my hatred towards those damned OWLs. As I crossed the threshold from the ticket-taker's booth into the movie theatre, I pondered whether or not Zoolander would be another one of those films that gave away everything in its preview (if you're wondering too, keep reading).

Derek Zoolander is a male model, who has come to a "crossroads" in his life. For starters there's the article about him on the cover of Time magazine, "I'm With Stupid," and there's his devastating loss to hippie model-upstart Hansel at the VH-1 fashion awards. To make him feel better, Derek's male-model pals take him out on an Orange Mocha Frappuccino binge, and accidentally incinerate themselves, with a helpless Zoolander watching.

After "egooglie-izing" at his friend's funeral, Derek retires to seek spiritual enlightenment and a dignity that slipped away from him, hoping to break the dumb-model stereotypes that have invaded his life. Eventually, though, amidst his comeback, Zoolander gets involved in a sinister conspiracy to kill the Prime Minister of Malaysia.

Zoolander is a slapstick comedy that reeks of style-over-substance grooming. For starters, there are about thirty different celebrity cameos (wait until you see David Bowie). There are plenty of things to laugh about too, from Ben Stiller's lispy Zoolander, to Owen Wilson's spiritually inclined, pretty, surfer boy, model-of-the-year, manchild Hansel, to Jerry Stiller (who is HILARIOUS) as Maury Ballstein (Zoolander's agent), to unstoppable comic madman Will Ferrell.

David Duchovny also makes a brief appearance, as a has-been hand model out to uncover the truth behind the, "Male Model Assassin Conspiracy," and really sticks it to his old role on the "X-Files." There's also an orgy scene if you're into that sort of thing.

So uh, yeah. I did laugh, if you were wondering. A lot, actually. There is more to Zoolander than just the preview; Ben Stiller has a subtle sense of humor. Even though there is a lot of blatant humor, be on the look out for laughs that may be a little bit understated. And if that's not enough to get you in there, I would like to make one last point: This movie does not fall into the same category of the piles of crap that made a mockery out of American movie viewers this summer.

Days not so new, The Calling's lacking debut

THE CALLING
Camino Palmero
RCA

There is one thing that puzzles me about The Calling – all group photos of the band show five individuals, but it seems to me there are actually only two guys in the band. The website boasts, "Through it all, The Calling, draws on its big guns: Aaron Kamin's skillful atmospheric guitar and Alex Band's remarkable vocals." Hmmm... perhaps that's because THEY ARE THE ONLY GUYS IN THE BAND! The other three "members" of the band appear on only three of the eleven tracks. And Alex Band only sings. So basically Aaron Kamin, on guitars, percussion, sitar, mandolin and loops, is getting a bum deal.

Puzzlement over actual band members aside, the Camino Palmero is a competent debut album. The CD progresses through the grand scheme of life and amore – a song about love, several songs about rejection, a song about gaining forgiveness, then several songs about finding someone to save him. The story line of the CD could possibly be the feel-good movie of the year.

Alex Band's vocals are passionate and true, and his husky voice soars with the melodies. However, his voice is often too emotional for some of the insipid instrumentals accompanying him. There's an edge to Band's voice that lacks in the laid-back music. The songs have gentle drumbeats, softly strummed electric guitars and a sleepy, casual feel. Granted, it's a great CD for kicking back and relaxing, but Alex Band's passion deserves more emotion from the musicians. Or should I say musician – maybe it's just too difficult for Kamin to play all those instruments himself.

Lyrics like "Look down at the water/Before I jump in/To find I was sinking fast, in all that might have been" lose the edge they are sung with when paired with a melody that could be the background to a diet pill commercial. "In a world, where nothing's as it seems/Paved with broken dreams, I found truth", loses that truth with headbopping accompaniment.

Let's just hope that if The Calling ever does acquire some official band members, they have enough emotion to keep up with Alex Band's ardor. Stronger drums, bass and guitar could do wonders for The Calling's career. (Shauna Billings)

SUGARBOMB
"Bully"
RCA Records

Green Day was a great power-pop punk band. Blink 182 was the obvious successor to the throne, the inevitable follow-up, a Green Day for the late 90's.

But enough.

As if American Hi-Fi, Sum-41, and Sugar Ray aren't enough to drown our nation in saccharine sounding music, every other record company on the planet is attempting to release their own equivalent. Enter the Sugarbomb. Apparently, RCA Records has decided that watered down punk music isn't enough; it also has to avoid any hint of catchiness.

Ft. Worth, Texas natives Sugarbomb have successfully created what might be the blandest album of the past few months. Not only does Bully sound awfully fluffy, it also lacks anything that the band's website (www.sugarbomb.net) claims it has.

"[Sugarbomb] Makes it look easy," says the website. Yes, Sugarbomb did make it look easy, apparently taking only one or two takes per song. It would appear that the album's title track was recorded by the band while it was in the depths of an ether binge. There's really no evidence to counter the claim.

"Sugarbomb ambushes listeners," says the website, forgetting to add, "with horrible singles tailored for radio success at the cost of artistic integrity." For instance, "Hello" sounds like an N'Sync song with a slightly punkish delivery of the lyrics.

"In the long haul, the members of Sugarbomb have aimed high," says the website. High as in good or high as in the aforementioned ether binge that inevitably led the band to believe that "Posterchild for Tragedy" would be a good title for a song one wonders. What are they thinking? Styx, post Mr. Roboto?

Sugarbomb recorded an "undisguised tribute to Queen," says the website. Yes, a tribute, "undisguised" as in obviously awful. Queen was so good; what do they ever do to deserve the disrespect of an undisguised tribute? To tribute, Sugarbomb should have dressed in late night porno-wear: a dirty trench coat, sunglasses and a low hat if they'd really wanted to pay homage to a great band. That way, nobody would have known what they were doing and Queen wouldn't have been sullied.

Sufficed to say, Sugarbomb is a frantically bad band with Bully being a triumphantly bad album. Or as the website would say, "Sugarbomb...is right on target," and I would add, "to suck." (Sam Wilkinson)

DAYS OF THE NEW
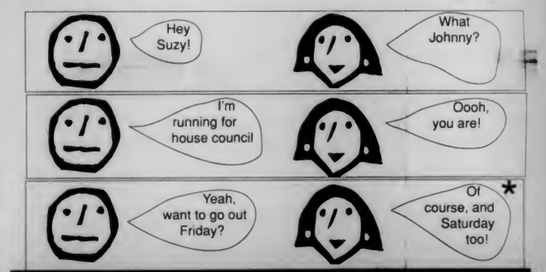
Geffen Records



There's nothing new about the new Days of the New CD titled Days of the New. Their typical white-boy, angst-driven rock is just as loud and aggressive as any of their past albums, which probably won't bother the fan base that they have collected over the several years that the band has been in the music biz.

Lead vocalist Travis Meeks screams his way through many of the songs while using his guitar to attack the vague traces of any sort of melody that is left over afterwards. After two very similar songs, "Hang on to This" and "Fighting with Clay," both of which are frantically paced, the band opts for a slower and less forceful song with "Days In Our Life." The problem with this song, and many of the others on the disc, is that the balance of the song relies too heavily on the hook. It follows a distinct pattern – verse, hook, instrumental, hook, etc. There's really nothing unpredictable about how the songs are arranged, which on the one hand makes them easier to remember and more radio-friendly, but doesn't exhibit any talent that the band most likely has underneath their fuming shell.

The track "Dirty Road" begins to shed the heavy metal skin that Days of the New has created for itself. The bluesy grunge sound of the song shows that the band may just yet surprise the listener with something that may be characteristically different for the band. It's too bad that they don't stick to songs like this where they could really show off, rather stuffing the album with songs like "Best of Life" and "Never Drown." It's just more of what the CD doesn't need: the cliched music

Phish and Primus members unite

OYSTERHEAD
Grand Pecking Order
Elektra Entertainment

As I eagerly anticipated the release of the first Oysterhead album, I was not and am still not exactly sure why. Deep down, I think I just wanted to hear what Trey Anastasio, the current, maybe former (??) front man of Phish was up to.

After a big summer for Trey, traveling around with his other side project, the Trey Anastasio Band, I was compelled to hear what his next endeavor would sound like. Hearing the disc from their May 2000 show at the New Orleans Jazz Festival, I was impressed simply by the way that they pulled together to perform with such a polished sound. After listening to this show some more, I realized that it was not so much the fact that Oysterhead had compelling music, but rather it was the culmination of three such amazing talents.

The band Oysterhead is a super trio made up of Stewart Copeland of the Police, Les Claypool of Primus and Les Claypool's Frog Brigade and Trey Anastasio of Phish and the Trey Anastasio Band. As most of the music is written collaboratively, there is no specific style or mood that can be picked out. I would imagine that the majority of the music would fall under the "freeform jazz" genre as it really does not follow any style that I have ever heard. The entire album does, however, have a very Les feel.

While still holding the album cover in my hands, I listened to each song by itself. With the exception of one or two songs (those having their lyrics or music solely written by Trey) all of the other songs sounded like what I would expect to hear from either Primus or the Frog Brigade. I wonder if this feel is a result of Claypool's over-influence or whether it is simply the sound that the trio was after.

I am trying not to sound too negative about this album, as many people will enjoy it for its sheer creativity. Maybe it is simply the fact that I was expecting or hoping for it to carry a much funkier texture throughout. Particularly bright spots for me include the third song, a groovy number titled "Mr. Oysterhead," as well as one of the songs solely written by Trey Anastasio titled "Radon Balloon," which almost sounds like it belongs on Billy Breathes.

The whole album carries a very militant feel, including two songs with especially political overtones titled "Shadow Of A Man." This song is about a man named Billy who went off to fight in the Vietnam War. In a possible anti-war statement, the song goes on to talk about the chemical weapons that Billy sprayed in Vietnam as well as about a Vietnamese girl he fell in love with who was unable to have a child due to the Agent Orange.

The other song two tracks later, titled "Army's On Ecstasy," discusses war, on the side of what I interpret to be Communist countries like China, which is mentioned earlier in the song. An example of some of Claypool's hauntingly intelligent lyrics comes towards the middle of the song when he says, "the price they put upon the heads/ Of folks with poignant views/ Would be better spent on/ The children without shoes."

Although this album was not what I expected, I have come to appreciate it more after I looked deeper into some of the intellectual yet catchy lyrics. If you were one of the lucky few to score Fall Oysterhead tickets, you are certainly in store for an interesting performance. They play the Tsongas Arena in Lowell on Saturday Nov. 10.

The talent and name recognition alone has stirred curiosity about Invincible. Excellent buzz on the album continues to mount as record executives and industry insiders have been raving about tracks that have been previewed. But while the formulaic R&B grinder of a first single has been getting airplay on urban and pop stations, response has been less than overwhelming. However, just two days after the MTV premiere of his first "short film" (Jackson's term for a video) of "You Rock My World" Jackson surprisingly entered the countdown, mostly represented by teen acts, at No. 9.

So, can Jackson avoid becoming the King of Flop and reclaim his throne as the King of Pop? Apparently, the biggest question in entertainment also turns out to be the trickiest.

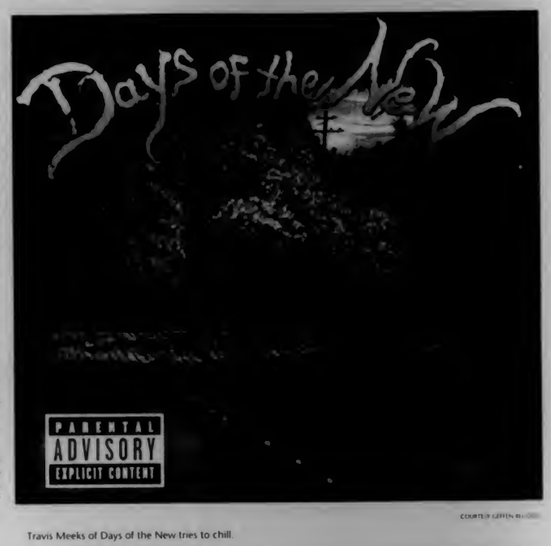
that has become familiar in the metal genre where Days has fit itself in.

"Die Born" may be Days of the New's crossover song to the mainstream pop scene if there is such a thing. It is a ballad with a catchy refrain and it is clean of profanities (which the new album seems to be more laden with than previous works). Beggars can't be choosers and it's rare nowadays to find some with lyrics that really stand out above the rest. "Die Born" as well as many of the other songs begin with lyrically sound verses, but then crumble into stupidity.

Take for instance this example from the aforementioned track, "I am the King/ The King of the Jungle/ I am the little dog/ The King of the Jungle makes me humble."

Days of the New certainly isn't trying for brilliantly inspired lyrics, since their fans spend more time moshing than really concentrating on who flick is singing. There's even a song called "Words," which would make one think that it's full of intelligent lyrics, but there's no such luck.

The nearly 11 minute song "Dancing with the Wind" is the final cut and the band employs what sounds like a chamber ensemble or a limited orchestra for the song. But this tunes is no "November Rain," nor is Days of the New anything closely resembling a band like Metallica who gave one of their best performances with complete orchestration. At least not yet. If this is any proof, then Days of the New could become something greater than what's found on this CD. The song is a valiant effort, though, and it does hold its own, especially when comparing against the lethargic monotony of the songs that preceded it.



There are only a few tracks that deserve time and attention, but they are very few and far between. Days of the New's latest release tests the water to see if the audience they play for is receptive to the few attempts they make at a different sound. If they continue along this path they may yet find their niche in the large metal music landscape. (Jake D. Lewis)

Alpha Motherfuckers: A Tribute to Turbonegro
Hopeless

Norway's Turbonegro never was the roaring success that their hellbent "Punk n' Roll" warranted, but Alpha Motherfuckers aims to let people in on what they were missing. A who's who of balls-out Turbo-inspired rock acts like Supersuckers, Nashville Pussy and Zeke have lined up to pay tribute, as well as some slightly out-of-the-box picks like Hot Water Music and Queens of the Stone Age to keep things interesting.

Turbonegro, the sitcn call from Oslo that has brought everyone from Finnish goths to Uruguayan rockers out to cover songs about denim and pizza, released five albums in their ten year history that ended, with many other cool bands, in 1998. I don't have any of their stuff, although I've been meaning to buy 1997's Apocalypse Dudes ever since I saw the review for it years ago in Kerrang! Now I feel like less of a man for not knowing songs this good from a band this cool.

Alpha Motherfuckers is a useful wake-up call to such clueless saps. About half of the tracks kick ass, the other half tri really hard to kick ass, and all of them make you want to hear the originals. Any band that has other bands trying this hard to do them justice is definitely worth raiding their back catalogue. Among the ass-kickers is first and foremost the cover of "Denim Demon" by Therapy?, a song that could be rock n' roll's official all-purpose anthem. If you don't love this song by the time "outside of society!" is shouted repeatedly during the explosive coda, you don't rock. Nick Oliveri, now of Queens of The Stone Age, takes on "Back To Dungaree High" in his best "Tension Head"-like maniacal approach. The Dwarves/Splittin Wix cover of "Hobbit Motherfuckers" is by far the better (and more disturbing) of the two on the album, and Motorpsycho's smoky hass-heavy "He's a Grungewhore" is much preferred over Tohy Dammit's similarly slow but not nearly as interesting interpretation of "Prince of the Rodeo." Alpha Motherfuckers (had to slip it in there one more time) isn't perfect, but a lot of it rocks. Me: I'm off to get the originals. (Michael Delano)

UConn women's soccer coach Tsantiris wins 350th, 351st in Big East matches

By Mike Frank
The Daily Campus (U. Connecticut)

(U-WIRE) STORRS, CONN. – After a huge weekend of Big East conference games for the No. 11 UConn women's soccer team, the Huskies came up with two important victories and a milestone for head coach Len Tsantiris.

UConn mustered a 2-1 overtime victory against Providence College at Morrone Stadium on Sunday, after destroying No. 17 Miami on Friday on their turf 5-0 for Tsantiris's 350th career win.

The contest against the Friars has traditionally been very one-sided. The Huskies owned an 18-1 advantage all-time against Providence prior to Sunday's game, winning eight in a row. In the span of those eight games, the Huskies outscored the Friars 47-0. In 1998, UConn walked away with an 11-0 victory.

Sunday, the Friars were ready to change the course of history.

"Providence is a lot better than last year," said Tsantiris.

Four minutes and two seconds into the game, Providence sent a shot sailing just beyond the reach of sophomore goalie Erin Rice to make the score 1-0 Friars.

"We were kind of caught off guard there, nobody was planning to lose the first goal," said Rice. "But we knew what we had to do, so we did it."

After that, UConn's defense was determined to shut down the Friars. Providence did not get another shot on goal for the duration of the game.

"That's really the only time they had a good shot on goal," said Rice. "The defense shut them down the rest of the game; they played phenomenally."

Providence's lead stood for 63 minutes and 44 seconds, when freshman midfielder Abby Shepherd notched her second goal of the season. A Friar defender deflected a kick from Mary-Beth Bowie to Shepherd and she put it in.

With 12:17 passed in overtime, Salla Ranta scored the game-winning goal from about eight yards away. She was assisted by Alexa Borisjuk and Mary-Beth Bowie. The UConn sideline rushed the field immediately as the Huskies walked off with the win.

On Friday, UConn faced another improved opponent by the name of the Miami Hurricanes. That was meant to be the difficult match-up of the weekend, with the Canes in the running to steal UConn's first place spot.

On a special day, the Huskies were not about to give anything to Miami, to whom they now own a 3-0 lifetime record against.

In a steady downfall of southern Florida rain, the Huskies pounded Miami 5-0, earning their coach career win No. 350. The win was also UConn's fourth straight shutout, all against Big East opponents.

"I feel good about the big [Big East] win," said Tsantiris. "The [milestone], I'm not even interested in."

The Huskies are now 7-2-0 overall [4-0 Big East] while the Friars fell to 4-3-1 [0-2-1] and the Hurricanes are now 6-2-0 [1-1-0]. UConn will face Florida on Tuesday at 7 p.m. at Morrone Stadium in a makeup game from earlier this season.

Who will get MLB's annual hardware?

The 2001 Major League Baseball season is drawing to a close and with it, the races for individual awards in both leagues. The year has seen one man's run at home run history, one pitcher's run at the greatest single season record ever, and one Japanese import's run around the bases on a daily clip. Therefore, it is now time to single out those players that deserve the recognition for their individual efforts during the season.

National League Manager of the Year: Larry Bowa, Philadelphia; Runner-Up: Bob Brenly, Arizona – Brenly has his team two games ahead of the San Francisco Giants in the N.L. West heading into last night's action, but how many people truly expected Bowa to have his Phillies just two games behind the mighty Atlanta Braves with one week left. His fire and candor has been a great source of leadership for his young team from the city of Brotherly Love. Bowa has had his run-ins with star third baseman Scott Rolen, but he had those run-ins at times when Rolen needed something to motivate him. There is no coincidence that whenever the run-ins happened, Rolen hit like a man possessed. Even if the Phillies do not make the playoffs, the fact that Bowa has his team in this position with one week left is enough to get the Manager of the Year nod.

American League Manager of the Year: Lou Pinella, Seattle; Runner-Up: Art Howe, Oakland – Howe is going to get tired of this bridesmaid's crap. He will finish second in this category for the third straight year. He has no argument any year for the award. Boston's Jimy Williams led the Red Sox to the ALCS in 1999, so he deserved it. Chicago's Jerry Manuel led a team from 20 games under .500 to the best record in baseball last season, so he deserved it. And, is there any doubt that Pinella should get it this year? What with the losses of Randy Johnson, Ken Griffey Jr. and Alex Rodriguez the last three years in succession, the Mariners' win total has increased in each season, including a run at the all-time record this year. This is a slam-dunk choice and "Sweet Lou" is much deserving of this year's award.

National League Rookie of the Year: Albert Pujols, St. Louis; Runner-Up: Roy Oswalt, Houston – In any other year, Oswalt and Philadelphia's Jimmy Rollins would be in a two-dog race for the award, but those two pale in comparison to the numbers the Cardinals slugger has put up. He has a .331 batting average with 37 home runs, a National League rookie record 128 runs batted in and 187 hits. With Mark McGwire hindered with a batting average under .200, Jim Edmonds having a sub-par season and J.D. Drew lost for two months, Pujols was the glue that kept the batting order together. He will be in the top five for NL MVP, and will certainly garner NL Rookie of the Year honors as well.

American League Rookie of the Year: Ichiro Suzuki, Seattle; Runner-Up: Alfonso Soriano, New York – Do I even need to discuss this? The stats speak for themselves: .348 batting average, a Major League rookie record 235 hits, 123 runs scored, 53 stolen bases and only 51 strikeouts. The seven-time Japan League batting champion is on his way to his first batting crown in America. Not a bad $13 million investment by the Mariners.

National League Cy Young: Curt Schilling, Arizona; Runner-Up: Randy Johnson, Arizona – This season, Johnson's stats are as good as they have ever been, 20 wins, a 2.52 ERA, and career-high 366 strikeouts. That is why not giving him this award will be a tough thing to do, until you look at his teammate's numbers. Schilling is 21-6 with a 2.97 ERA. He leads the NL with six complete games, has 285 strikeouts and, more importantly for the Diamondbacks, Schilling is 12-1 after Arizona loses this season. Randy Johnson's numbers might sway some votes his way, but Schilling's ability to be the stopper on that team has made him the best pitcher in the NL this year, and thus will earn him his first Cy Young Award. Why can't the Red Sox get pitchers like this?

Hit and Run with Dr. Rose

American League Cy Young: Roger Clemens, New York; Runner-Up: Mark Mulder, Oakland – I will begrudgingly give this award to the fireballer in pinstripes. While Mulder leads the Major Leagues in both complete games and shutouts, and Seattle's Freddy Garcia is the only pitcher in the AL with an ERA under 3.00, a 20-2 record is something that we have not seen in our lifetime. Plus, his ERA is now a respectable 3.44 and he leads the AL with 208 strikeouts. This one will mark an unprecedented sixth Cy Young Award for Clemens and his win total this year has left him just 20 wins short of the magical mark of 300 for his career. Why can't the Red Sox ever get pitchers like this?

National League Most Valuable Player: Barry Bonds, San Francisco; Runner-Up: Sammy Sosa, Chicago – Until the month of September, if you had asked most people around baseball who deserved this award, they would have said Sosa. But the Cubs have fallen off and so has he. This is a cakewalk for Bonds, who is arguably putting together one of the top five individual seasons in baseball history. He is chasing McGwire's home run mark, but he also has these numbers heading into last night's game: An NL record 167 walks, a .505 on base percentage and an .846 slugging percentage. No one has had an on-base percentage over .500 in fifty years and only one other player has ever had a slugging percentage over .800 – Babe Ruth. Why can't the Red Sox...ok you already know the drill and I already know that home run record or not, playoffs or not, Bonds is the clear cut MVP.

American League Most Valuable Player: Jason Giambi, Oakland; Runner-Up: Roberto Alomar, Cleveland – This is by far the toughest award to choose from. Here is my thinking on this one: Can a Cleveland Indian get the award? Well if you look at it that way, the logical choice would be Alomar, who has a .336 batting average with 20 home runs, 100 RBI and 112 runs scored. However, with Jim Thome and Juan Gonzales having MVP caliber seasons as well, that will take away from his votes.

Then, I thought, the Mariners are close to setting an AL, and possibly Major League, record for wins in a season, maybe I should give it to someone from their team. Bret Boone has had an incredible season with 35 long balls and 136 RBI. However, two things come into play for him. He is on Seattle and he might be penalized, like Frank Thomas was last year, for being on a team so far ahead in the standings. Secondly, he has Ichiro, who is on base more than anybody in baseball this season. Ichiro himself will be penalized because he was great in Japan and no one was shocked that he would great in America.

Alex Rodriguez of Texas has the best stats with 51 jacks, 132 RBI and 132 runs scored, but I refuse to give it to a player who's team is 59 games out of first place. The Rangers are 12 games under .500 with him and they could be 12 games under .500 without him. Giambi's stats are comparable to last year when he won the award; .339 average, .474 on-base percentage, 124 walks to only 81 strikeouts, 103 runs scored, 35 homers and 113 runs batted in. He has been the leader of the A's who were 8-18 to start the season and now might win 100 games. A tough choice, but my nod goes to Giambi.

he sent Josh Holbrook packing 8-2.

"I was injured the first week of practice and last week my play was not up to par," said Prisco. "After today I feel a little more confident and in a couple weeks I should be playing well."

Newcomer Sam Leeb continued to make a statement through his solid play as he breezed past J.P. Debbink 6-0, 6-2. Reblin, who played little tennis last year due to ineligibility after transferring from Texas, proved he has the goods as he captured a win against Jason Vindoles 5-7, 6-4, 6-2. No. 6 Phil Rodrigues also addressed many of Dixon's concerns at the end of the line-up with 6-4, 6-4 crushing of Noel Moossa.

"In general, I was very pleased with the match," said Dixon. "With Rory [Theis] injured, we know that there will be no easy matches. I'm very happy with the play at No. 5 and No. 6 from Phil and Eric. I saw some more confidence in them that I hadn't seen in other matches."

The next challenge ahead for the UMass squad takes place next Tuesday as the squad battles Hartford University at home on the Upper Bowden courts. Last year, the Minutemen clipped the Hawks' wings with a 7-0 shutout. The Maroon and White will follow up their home court advantage Wednesday with a match against foe Amherst College. Both of these matches serve as key preparation for a bitter rival – the Huskies of Connecticut. The squad journeyed to Storrs last year and came up short 5-2 to the strong, consistent Husky program. A win for Massachusetts this fall against Connecticut would not only end its season on a positive note, it would also provide the team with momentum for the vital Atlantic 10 conference matches in the spring.

"The matches against Williams and Binghamton were more of a scrimmage," said Prisco. "The BU match was the first real match against a team that we play consistently from year to year. We have the Hartford and Amherst match which are key next week. But the big match we're looking ahead to is UConn on Oct. 23. They beat us last year and we'd definitely like to avenge that.

Senior Brooke Bartlett (No. 5) was one of many UMass players to battle injury yesterday in Boston.

Not high enough

UMass falls just 'short'

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. – As the saying goes, all good things must come to an end. But as the early 90's pop divas Wilson Phillips said, we would all like to just "hold on for one more day." However, you can't have it both ways as the Massachusetts women's soccer team discovered yesterday afternoon, falling 2-0 at Harvard's Ohiri Field, ending its three-match winning streak.

The Crimson (4-1) tallied a goal on either side of half-time en route to their fourth consecutive victory.

Orly Ripmaster opened the scoring with a 27th minute strike off a free kick and Caitlin Costello clinched it in the 72nd minute with her team-leading fifth goal of the season. But the real star of the show was the Crimson defense. The back four limited the number of quality chances for the Minutewomen (4-2, 1-0 Atlantic 10) and when UMass did find a way through, goalkeeper Cheryl Gunther was there to make the save.

"This is a team you don't want to get down to," said UMass head coach Jim Rudy of the Crimson. "You don't want to get down because they're so big that you might not be able to get back."

Getting down is exactly what the Minutewomen did as junior midfielder Martha Conover was whistled for a foul 25 yards from goal. Two Harvard players, sophomore Katie Westfall and Ripmaster stood over the ball as UMass goalie Julie Podhrasky organized her wall. Eventually it was Ripmaster, a junior from Boulder, Colo., who struck a swerving ball over the UMass wall and just inside Podhrasky's right post. It was 1-0 to the Crimson, much to the dismay of Coach Rudy.

"[The foul] was a little petty and I was surprised because that official doesn't usually blow a lot," he said. "I thought Martha went in well, blocked it, won it and their kid went down. I thought it was a good tackle, but you can't question the quality of the free kick. She really ripped it."

Both keepers were tested often throughout the first half but were equal to the challenge. Gunther was forced to make a pair of saves at the feet of sophomore Erin Lilly, one off a Conover drive as well as watching a Stephanie Santos blast fly just over the crossbar. At the other end of the pitch, Podhrasky made five quality saves en route to nine overall, to keep the scoreline at 1-0 as the teams headed into halftime.

The Minutewomen came out in the second 45 looking to dictate the pace of play and take the match at the Crimson. This strategy nearly paid off just five minutes into the half as Lilly was on the receiving end of a cheeky one-two just outside the box and was through on goal. However, she took one touch too many and had the ball knocked away for a corner by a sliding Harvard defender.

"I think if she hit it first time she had a great chance to score," Rudy said. "But she took a little extra touch and the defender came in and cleared it out."

This would be one of the few times that the Minutewomen would get in behind the Crimson defense in the second half as it tried to protect the one goal lead. Harvard kept putting numbers back behind the ball, getting forward only on the counter-attack, a tactic that paid off in the 72nd minute.

The Crimson picked the ball up at midfield and quickly attacked the UMass back line. Costello was able to turn past UMass captain Sarah Cook and get into the box before hitting a square ball to senior Colleen Moore. Moore took a pair of shots, both of which were blocked down by the UMass defense. But the defense could not clear the ball before it squirted loose to Costello who fired a low right-footed shot under Podhrasky and into the UMass net to make the score 2-0.

"[Clearing the ball] is one of our weaknesses," Rudy said. "We work on it, but it's been a sort of Achilles heel for us. But it's something we're going to keep working on until we get it right."

This second goal forced the Minutewomen to go to three upfront as opposed to their traditional two, in a last ditch attempt at creating some quality chances. Senior midfielder Brooke Bartlett was pushed onto the forward line, but she and the rest of the UMass attack struggled to find a hole in the Harvard defense. The only shots that the Minutewomen could muster in the final 15 minutes came from well outside the 18-yard box and did little to challenge Gunther, who finished the match with seven saves.

Bartlett came into the match carrying an ankle injury and showed her bravery and toughness to play all 90 minutes but was clearly not 100 percent. But Bartlett was not the only injured UMass party, as freshman Erica Videberg played only sparingly, with back-spasms and Lilly and Michelle Luttati both picked up knocks during the run of play. The limited role of these players further limited the quality chances that the Minutewomen created.

The wounded Minutewomen return to action on Friday afternoon when the head down to Bronx, N.Y. to take on Fordham in a key A-10 matchup.

Men's tennis bites Terriers

The Massachusetts men's tennis team succeeded in its first home endeavor of the season by taking the bite out of the Boston University Terriers with a 5-2 victory. Coming into the match with the memory of last year's 7-0 shutout against the Terriers on their home court, coach Josh Dixon's crew performed with confidence in both singles and doubles action in their first real test of the fall.

B.U.	2

The Minutemen set the tone of the match by capturing the doubles point, which, once again, served as a momentum builder for singles action. The new pairing of senior Steve Prisco and inexperienced freshman Scott Sans Ieeb came up big for the squad, dominating Adam Segal/Geoff Wagner with an 8-2 win.

"The biggest thing that I have to work on now is playing doubles," said Sans Ieeb. "In high school I mainly played singles and I'm not used to playing singles after a doubles match. Last weekend against Williams and Binghamton I was a little bit tired but now I'm getting used to it. After today's win, I feel I'm getting better at it."

In No. 2 doubles play, the tandem of captain Todd Champeau/Eric Reblin answered Dixon's prayers by slamming Noel Mussa/John Molski 8-1.

"I'm quite pleased with the No. 2 doubles," said Dixon. "They have the ability to play well together and they proved that today. It was a good showing."

After claiming the doubles point, the Maroon and White rose to the occasion in singles with four key wins that solidified its victory. No. 1 Prisco, who played little during the summer months and has also suffered injuries, answered some questions about his condition as

Showing signs of improvement

Pivotal game today in Boston

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Apparently size does matter, at least for the Boston University field hockey team – although when it comes to turf, smaller is better.

For instead of playing on field turf, a longer type of artificial mat that is good for soccer but bad for field hockey, the team has decided to play its home games at nearby campuses, and tonight, its old homeland of Nickerson Field.

This way, the Terriers will instead play their games on a shorter type of turf that allows for more ball and foot speed.

So instead of traveling to BU, the Massachusetts field hockey team will instead head over to Bentley College, in order to square off with the Terriers.

This game is pivotal for the confidence of the Minutewomen, who have struggled to a 2-5 (0-0 Atlantic 10) record thus far. However, the team has shown signs of improvement of late, battling UConn closely last Saturday before succumbing to its rival, 3-1.

"We are a pretty young team, but we have gotten better with every game," Head Coach Patty Shea said. "This [contest] will give us a chance to pull out game closer together."

Overall, Shea has been happy with her team's progress, especially after the game against the Huskies.

"Sometimes when there is a loss on the scoreboard, it is tough to find the positives, especially when you are a player," she said. "But you need to look within the game to find good things. Sometimes tough losses are your best games."

As could be expected, Anke Bruemmer has once again led the offense for the Maroon and White. The senior back has totaled seven goals and is looking to eclipse her previous career-high of 16 by the season's end.

When UMass is not on the penalty corner, the majority of the offense has been generated by Erika Whiston (three goals, three assists) and by Stacey Blue (one goal, three assists). Freshman Ashley Gilbert has also contributed to the attack with a goal and a pair of helpers.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Senior Anke Bruemmer and the Massachusetts field hockey team will face B.U. today at Bentley College.

For BU (4-4, 3-0 America East), Felicia Cappabianca has led the team with four goals and two assists, while Whitney Peabody and Jane Rogers have also been offensive forces, totaling four and three scores, respectively. On the other side of the ball, Susan Harrington has manned the net, boasting a 2.56 goals against average.

"They are a young team," Shea said. "But they are fast, have stick skills and have experience in goal. We have to deny them the ball, close out their spaces in a hurry, and on the other side of the field we need to take the ball to goal."

Last year during the regular season, the Minutewomen and Terriers had an absolute battle, with the Maroon and White finally prevailing 2-1 after two overtime periods and two periods of penalty strokes. In the NCAA playoffs, the two teams met once again and BU once again fell by the same score.

In fact, the last four times these teams have played, the score has been 2-1, with UMass coming out the victor in three of those contests.

One sign that bodes well for the Minutewomen is that they defeated Boston College earlier in the year 2-1, while the Terriers fell to the Eagles 4-1. However, Shea warned that using that as a way to judge another team could end up being a fatal mistake.

"Every weekend somebody is beating somebody else up," the fifth year coach said. "You just have to take care of yourselves. We want to build up to conference play because our goal is to make the NCAA tournament."

A win against BU would be a good way to start.

We are all Real Americans, we fight for the rights of every man. Got it? See the Cover.

Faculty Senate to meet about funding

By Erik Haan
Collegian Staff

The sources of athletic funding at the University of Massachusetts will be challenged for their effectiveness in a report that will be presented at today's 595th meeting of the Faculty Senate.

The report, entitled "A Comparison of Revenues and Expenditures at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and Six Peer Institutions," focused on the Fiscal Year 1999 and revealed that UMass drains a far greater percentage of its general operating funds towards its athletic programs when compared to 6 similar schools.

In terms of dollars spent per full time student equivalent, the report found that the University spends approximately three times as much money towards athletics as fellow institutions Rutgers, University of California-Santa Barbara, University of Colorado- Boulder, University of Connecticut-Storrs, University of Maryland- College Park and University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

"It skews the entire picture of what a university should be all about," said Presiding Officer and Rules Committee member Frank Hugus. "They really should be paying more of their own expenses."

The findings on athletics were part of a larger study that also zeroed-in on discrepancies with the other schools in operations and maintenance of campus facilities, financial aid, and capital expenditures.

The study was conducted by the UMass Amherst Office of Financial Cost Analysis, in conjunction with the Office of Institutional Research and the Office of Academic Planning and Assessment, of schools with similar financial structures. Information on the peer institutions was gathered from the annual Integrated Post-Secondary Education Data System (IPEDS) reports, a financial reported submitted by each institution to the government.

The report also found that cutting back on the amount that UMass

The Student Government Association expected a light first meeting last night, but were surprised when debate was called on the decision to appoint Attorney General Mike Marin to the Student Legal Services Office Governing Board.

In response to SGA President John Sheehan's decision to appoint Marin to the post, Commuter Area Governor Rob Moore called for debate questioning Marin's ability to perform the task at hand. Moore brought up an issue regarding the SGA's spring funding account, in which he called Marin into question over missing funds.

"I requested for our budget of $750 last spring, and the transaction was signed by Marin [Marin was formally the Executive Secretary of Finance], yet we never received the money," Moore said. "If you can't handle the power that you have, why give you more?"

Executive Cabinet Secretary of Finance Gabriel Tavarez responded on behalf of Marin, explaining that it was not Marin's job to sign any paperwork regarding budget allocations.

"The truth of the matter is that it's not the Secretary of Finance's job [to allocate this money]," Tavarez said. "I've looked through all the paperwork and there is not any paperwork or signatures regarding this allocation of funds. To question whether or not he did his [Marin's] job is wrong. It's Rob's job to see that Rob gets his money, and that's the same for any of the other area governments."

Ultimately, a voice vote approved Marin's appointment with a sizeable majority. Tavarez and Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders were also approved to serve on the Board.

In other happenings at the meeting, members of the SGA Executive Cabinet expressed their congratulations to the newly elected Senate.

SGA President John Sheehan explained to the Senate that this is their chance to make a difference for the student body.

"A lot of you guys are new to this job, and so am I. I was elected last spring, and it's been a big learning curve for me," Sheehan said. "I could give my legislative agenda for the year, but I won't because this isn't my Senate. I'm not the leader of the Senate, Aaron [Saunders] is. And I'm looking forward to a great year and putting the past behind us."

Senate members had the opportunity to ask questions, many of which focused on the issue of voter turnout and making students' voice and vote take effect on campus.

"We're going to do all in our power to get more voter turnout in upcoming elections so that things such as referendum questions will hold more weight when presented to the Administration," Sheehan said.

Saunders spoke to the Senate on a variety of issues which he hopes to get resolved this year, including working with Parking Services on the cost of parking passes and the conditions of lots, overenrollment in residence halls, on-campus cameras and violations of confidentiality by off-campus landlords.

Saunders also approached the Senate with a suggested dress code, explaining that dressing appropriately shows pride in oneself and the SGA as an organization.

Lecture series begins at Food for Thought

By Elizabeth Pariseau
Collegian Staff

Food for Thought Books has recently announced its contribution to the community-building efforts sparked by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks; the store will be hosting talks by several nationally-recognized politically progressive authors during the month of October.

The first talk, scheduled for October 4, at 7:00p.m. in the bookshop, will be given by Agostin Lao Montes, an Assistant Professor in the Sociology Department at the University of Massachusetts. He is the co-editor of a recently released book, Mambo Montage: the Latinization of New York City. The lecture, according to a press release, will draw on the themes of this book, and will be "a report on the state of Latino politics and culture in New York-the most populous and diverse Latino City in the United States."

The book is an anthology of articles, which, according to the release, "map out the main conceptions of Latino identity as well as the historical process of Latinization in New York."

The colors of diversity

Is there equal representation at UMass?

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Diversity. In today's world for ever-striving political correctness, diversity is seen as the ultimate goal.

Examples of this can be seen almost anywhere. College campuses across the United States boast about their diversified environments. Even the University of Massachusetts's official online introduction states about the campus, "Its size, diversity, and the richness of its academic and extracurricular offerings provide almost unlimited possibilities for personal growth and professional development."

However, do claims such as this live up to its expectations? At UMass, at least, sheer statistics and personal feelings of some of the student body would suggest the answer is no.

The numbers, and more importantly, the percentages of people of color, also referred to as ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, and Native American), at UMass have taken a bit of a dive over the past few years.

According to a study done by the Office of Institutional Research (OIR) produced last May, the percentages of ALANA students on campus have slowly been decreasing.

In the fall of 1998, the percentage of ALANA students on campus was 19 percent. Over the next two years, that overall percentage dropped to 17 percent. Preliminary statistics for this year claim that the percentage might stay the same, rise slightly, or even drop to 16 percent.

To students of color on campus, this news is simply disheartening, as junior Communications major Shameeka Leacock pointed out.

"Although there are new freshmen coming in every year," she said, "there are fewer students of color."

To Leacock, the saddest part of all is that as students' progress through their academic college careers, more and more students of color are lost.

"The few we do have," she added with a bit of hope, "I think are hard working and constructive in educating [others] about diversity."

She mentioned how it pleases her to see the University offer an abundance of classes that talk about diversity issues, noting that in that aspect, UMass is working towards making the campus more diverse.

"However," she regretfully admitted, "the majority of my classes continue to lack diverse students."

Sophomore Social Thought and Political Economics double major Dao Nguyen disagreed with Leacock in that she believes diversity in the classroom and around the campus differ greatly because of the University's size, citing the example that one could be in a class with practically no students of color and then walk outside and meet many different people from many different races.

However, Nguyen made sure to note how one's views on this situation differ from person to person.

"For me, I grew up in a all white town," she explained, "I never had a chance to hang out with [large numbers of] other Asian Americans, and so I'm used to the composition of the classroom."

But indeed, the changes classroom composition over times is something to be inspected.

According to the OIR Factbook, in the fall of 1998, the percentage of ALANA students on campus was 16.9 percent of the freshmen body, only 655 students in a class of 3,866.

In 1999, those numbers dropped to 605 ALANA students out of a class of 4,060 people, or 14.9 percent.

"A couple of years ago, the University made an official new policy," said Lind, "Race and ethnicity is one in a number of factors of admission, but it can't be an overall riding factor."

The numbers rose slightly in the fall of 2000 to 15.4 percent of the class, but even still ALANA students only make up 573 students out of a class of 3,731 people.

Detailed statistics for the most recent freshmen class this past fall are not yet available.

Students such as junior Pre-Communications/Economics double major Tinisha Burgess, Public Relations Officer for Black Student Union, feel these low numbers discourage many students.

"Of course, with the limited number of ALANA students on this campus, a lot of students feel isolated and left out," she said. "They join RSOs to bring the community together, and show the campus our view."

Burgess recalled situations in which she was one of only two or three students of color in a class, explaining how one is more apt to feeling uncomfortable in such situations.

"I know that if I'm late to class, I'll stand out. Standing out can be a good thing, if you're an excellent student," she pointed out, "but if you're late to class once or twice, or your grades are not "A" material, it's not good."

She explained her even deeper frustration with these statistics upon breaking the category of "ALANA" down into its respective groups.

"The number of African-American, Latino/a and Native American students has declined," said Burgess, "but the number of Asians has increased, and that's what UMass is using against us, saying, 'Well, the number of Asians has gone up!'

The Commonwealth College Honors Program is another area in which statistics present a grim view of diversity on campus.

According to it official website, "The college hopes to recruit the best high school students from across the Commonwealth and expects that its student body will be diverse." However, expectations do not always match with hard numbers, as has been the case for Commonwealth College for quite some time.

Among the 588 freshmen that entered Commonwealth College in the fall of 1999, 47 reported themselves to be of ALANA ethnicity.

The following year, 527 freshmen joined the college in the fall of 2000. Only 48 of those students reported to be ALANA.

Most recently, statistics show that 515 freshmen entered Commonwealth College at the beginning of this year, and 42 of them reported to be ALANA students.

The numbers may, in reality, be slightly off because of those students who did not wish to report their ethnicity.

For example, out the freshmen entering the honors college in 1999, 80 of them did not report their ethnicity. The next year, that number slightly dropped to 66 students, and this year 52 of the incoming Commonwealth College freshmen opted not to report.

Even factoring in the students who did not report their ethnicity, the facts remain that ALANA students are greatly underrepresented in the honors program. The question lingers as to why this is the case.

Initially, attention was turned towards the college's recruitment practices to see if any answers could be found.

Meredith Lind, Director of Communication & Program Development at Commonwealth College, described the recruitment policy of the college, which can occur in one of two ways.

First, a student could be invited to join the college upon his/her acceptance into UMass, based upon a combination of his/her high school grade point average (GPA), class rank and leadership activities along with his/her college application essay, personal statement, recommendation letters and SAT scores, explained Lind.

"It isn't hard fast on numbers alone," she pointed out, explaining that if a student's SAT scores were lower than the college's requirement, a student could still be accepted if other areas were exceptionally stronger, such as is his/her GPA and essay.

She noted this tends to be the case, depending on which area a student lives, citing the example of students from rural areas who, on average, tend to have lower SAT scores than those students from higher populated regions.

During this recruitment of students directly from their high schools, Commonwealth College advisors do not actually select incoming freshmen into their program.

Instead, the college relies on the admissions office to choose students who meet their specified criteria, which does not include an explicit affirmative action policy due to the court's ruling in the 1998 Boston Latin court case that prohibited such a guideline.

"A couple of years ago, the University made an official new policy," said Lind, "Race and ethnicity is one in a number of factors of admission, but it can't be an overall riding factor."

The second way a student could join Commonwealth College is if he/she applies directly to the college upon finishing his/her first semester at UMass with a GPA of 3.2 or higher. Again, no overruling affirmative action policy is permissible in this selection process.

One of the more curious facts to be debated about Commonwealth College statistics is that even though UMass enrolled a larger than usual freshmen class this fall, the number of freshmen accepted into Commonwealth College remained about the same, and thus less proportional to the rest of the student body than ever.

Specifically stated, preliminary statistics from August 8 showed that 4,173 students enrolled in this year's freshmen class; 42 of them are ALANA students in Commonwealth College.

Last year's freshmen class enrolled 3,731 students, and 48 of them became ALANA students in the honors program.

"When I commented on the change, they [admissions office] told me the overall pool had changed, and we were a subgroup out of that," commented Lind.

While no one has concrete answers as to why students of ALANA ethnicity are so underrepresented in the college, Lind noted that the general trend seen through the years as a particular class moves along is that more ALANA students enter the program over time.

Based on statistics from last October, the trend shows that in the class of 2003 (that freshmen class from 1999 with 47 ALANA students), 80 students were of ALANA ethnicity.

The class before them followed a similar pattern. This year's graduating class is recorded as having 61 ALANA students, which is somewhat higher compared to when the class entered the honors college in their freshmen year with only 36 ALANA students.

Lind accredited at least some of this trend to the fact that Commonwealth College encourages its students to work with various ALANA support groups on campus.

"We ask them to encourage students to join the college," she said, "This allows students to get more information [about opportunities at the college]."

While this trend does appear hopeful, one should note that it is not just the numbers of ALANA students that have risen over time. In reality, all students' numbers increase as time passes.

For instance, the freshmen class of 1998 had 360 white, non-Hispanic students in it, but over time that number rose to 467. Likewise, the freshmen class of 1999 had 447 white, non-Hispanic students, which rose to 522.

These statistics point out that even though the numbers of ALANA students climb over time, the enormous gap between students of color and Caucasians is still present.

Perhaps one of the most significant repercussions of this gap is how it personally affects the way in which some Commonwealth College students of color feel about the program, such as one Junior/Senior Economics major who was recruited into the program his first year and wishes to be known only as

Maplewood seeks to stay open late; Amherst groups plan performance

By Nathan Jones
Collegian Staff

Maplewood Farms Seeks To Extend Hours

The owners of Maplewood Farms restaurant and farm stand, Don Kramer and Phillip Sweeney, came before the Select Board at their Oct. 1 meeting and were denied a request to extend their hours from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m., with the advice to pursue a zoning change request to the voters at Town Meeting.

"This ties in with our desire to have live entertainment. We don't have room in the restaurant for a band to start playing until about 9:30pm, and most musicians want to play for around three hours," Kramer said. "The people there will stay longer and it will bring more in just to listen."

He went on to promise that the acts to be booked would be mostly jazz bands providing light background music, and thus Maplewood will not attract the kind of "loud and rowdy" college students Amherst late-night establishments have become infamous for.

Board Chair Carl Seppala acknowledged the good track record of Maplewood and its lack of neighborhood complaints, but stressed that this request is a zoning issue he simply can't get around. The area in which Maplewood is located is zoned residential, not commercial, and as such businesses are not generally permitted to begin with.

Maplewood Farms, with its farm stand, is an agricultural land use. However, he said, extending the hours into the late night is no longer in keeping with a residential zone, and while he would support the business staying open in principle, the only way Seppala felt it could legally be done would be to ask Town Meeting voters to change the area to a commercial district. He also noted that three previous attempts to change the zoning - in 1991, 92, and 94 - failed by large majority.

Sweeney felt he could not return to Town Meeting again, however, saying that the reason the idea had been previously rejected was not because people did not feel the area merits a commercial zoning designation, but because it could be construed as "spot zoning" - changing zoning to benefit a specific person or entity - which is against the law. He also noted that the Zoning Board of Appeals has already approved the hours.

The Board was not swayed.

"Town Meeting is the absolute authority on zoning change. Your operations are agricultural but you're getting into more commercial things which may disturb neighbors," Board Member Anne Awad said. "People leaving at 1 a.m., doors slamming, headlights. I support you, but I'm daunted by the Town Meeting record."

In the end, the Board took no action on the matter, planning to investigate the issue further over the next few weeks. For now, however, Maplewood will continue closing at 10 p.m. on weeknights and 11 p.m. on weekends.

Amherst College And Amherst Leisure Services Plan Halloween Performance

Amherst College student Andrew Epstein and Ezzell Floranina of Amherst Leisure Services have combined forces to plan Halloween night activities in downtown Amherst.

A parade had already been planned by ALS when Epstein came up with his idea to add artistic performances to the bill. In a recent interview, Epstein said described plans to have students put on brief performances.

The students, he said, will be mostly Amherst College recruits, although students from the other four colleges are welcome to participate.

The main event of the evening, however, will be a reproduction of Michael Jackson's "Thriller" video featuring 25 dancers and set against the backdrop of the Amherst Cinema on Amity Street. The festivities begin at 6:30 p.m. and will last about an hour. Half of Amity Street will be closed until about 7:30 p.m.

Joan Barberich, the Events Coordinator at Food for Thought, commented, "I think what he'll talk about is the degree to which Latin culture is getting absorbed into general New York culture, and how the Latino and Latina culture is growing exponentially, as their population grows. [Lao-Montes] is going to talk about what this means for the city."

Barberich said that Lao-Montes was selected because "he's a wonderful guy and a regular customer." She added, "we arranged this [event] before the terrible things happened in New York, but it seems like it would be nice to have some type of forum to talk about New York culture, at this time especially."

On Friday, October 5, Bill Ayers will be reading from his recent book, entitled Fugitive Days. According to Barberich, Ayers was co-founder of a radical political group in the 1960's called the Weathermen. The group protested the war in Vietnam "by any means necessary," even carrying out what Barberich called a "bloodless bombing" on the Pentagon.

Barberich said that these past experiences have had ominous ramifications for the author in recent times: "I think he has drawn a lot of people anyway, but now he's drawing a lot of negative press." Barberich cited last Sunday's New York Times Book Review, which she said characterized Ayers as a "terrorist," a label she called "unfair."

Barberich went on, "[Ayers' writing] is so controversial that he's going to draw people from the left and the right" to the event on October 5.

On Wednesday, October 17, at 7 pm, Boston author Ann Wadsworth will read from her debut novel, Light, Coming Back. According to a review by Elizabeth Stark, the book "is an exquisitely honest love story that reveals the delicate and steely threads that bind us to those few we connect with deeply. Unafraid of complexity and full of vitality, this is a tale that should have been told before now."

Said Barberich, "[Wadsworth] is published by a gay/lesbian press called Allison Press, and we agreed to have her come because we want to support that press. It's a wonderful, strong alternative press that supports a lot of progressive authors." Barberich also pointed out that Wadsworth is middle-aged, which she said makes her first book, "special...it's really interesting when someone has a lot of life experience and then writes a book."

The book, according to Barberich, is has "crossover" appeal. "Anyone would like this book. It's mainly about finding your true path in life."

On October 18, Eric Thomas Chester, will discuss his book, Rag-tags, Scum Riff-raff and Commies: The U.S. Intervention in the Dominican Republic, 1965-1966. According to Barberich, "This...uses a lot of recently declassified documents to prove that the CIA and the U.S. State Department and the Pentagon really suppressed the people's rebellion [in the Dominican Republic] to make sure that the outcome was going to be profitable for the United States."

On October 19, Food for Thought will have a visit from Tom Hayden, described by Barberich as a "famous anti-war, civil rights, environmental leader" who later served as a California state senator for 18 years. His book is a memoir about coalition building between different activist groups called Irish on the Inside. The book explores how the story of the Irish Potato Famine and Irish immigration give contemporary Irish-Americans a unique capability to understand the racism that happens to other groups.

Said Barberich, "[Hayden] is saying that we should work together to overcome that."

More talks will be announced throughout the fall and winter. The talks are a regular attraction at Food for Thought. According to Barberich, "we have a really active reading series, sometimes as many as three or four authors a week." Further information can be found at www-foodforthoughtbooks.com. A newsletter about the reading series is also available at Food For Thought, located on North Pleasant Street in Amherst.

Malcolm.

"It bothers and upsets me at times," he explained. "To me, [the college] is like a title you can put on your resume and not the elitist group they make it out to be. But at the same time, I'm not going to throw away the advantages [that accompany the program]."

Malcolm continued to point out his dismay at how the honors program prevents others from having those same advantages - others that he believes should have the same opportunities.

Furthermore because of his discouraged feelings, he has never taken any of the exclusive Commonwealth College honors courses available to him.

"But from what I've heard," he remarked, "they are not diverse."

Malcolm, like many others, acknowledges that the problems concerning race and ethnicity extend beyond classroom composition and honor colleges into day-to-day living, citing the example of his freshmen year when he lived in Orchard Hill.

"Every day, I got these messages left on my phone saying they were from the Ku Klux Klan and threatening me and telling me all this stuff, like nigger and such," he recalled, "I told my RA. She was like the only other black person I knew who lived there, and she called the police."

He explained that the seeming lack of interest in his situation was just as discouraging as the acts against him themselves.

"Five hours later," he stressed, "one policeman showed up riding a horse, and he just said that I should change my phone number."

Disheartened from what he considers a lack of serious effort on the part of authorities to put a stop to the threats, he never called the police again upon receiving similar phone calls from the same group of people throughout the remainder of that year.

> "The University should try to promote ALANA enrollment, to pursue ALANA students in high school, and encourage them to come to campus."

While perhaps no one can control other's actions and end all act of racism, a large consensus agree that creating a more diverse campus atmosphere would help to bring more understanding among everyone.

Burgess believes that there is always a way to improve diversity. While she admits the solution is hard to find, she pointed out that there is one way to begin to find an answer.

"We do have to acknowledge that the campus has a limited number of ALANA students," she said, "The University should try to promote ALANA enrollment, to pursue ALANA students in high school, and encourage them to come to campus."

"We need to give students a reason to come out to the polls on Election Day and we need to take pride in this organization to accomplish this," Saunders said. "People need to respect one another not only by dressing appropriately, but in how we address each other and speak in Senate."

Committees and Committee Chairs were also appointed at last night's meeting. The newly elected Chairs are: Administrative Affairs, Matt Pelnar; Diversity Chair, Scot Turnberg; Chair of Finance, Steve Hoeschele; Public Policy and Relations, Michael Whitehouse; University Policy, Courtney Horrocks; and Ways of Means, Michael Taugher.

As the Senate meeting came to a close, Saunders and Sheehan both expressed optimism towards the upcoming year and commended the Senate for its initial conduct.

"I was surprised that debate was called, but one thing I will say is that everyone kept it above the belt and showed respect towards one another," Sheehan said. "It seems that everyone is generally respectful and I think were going to see a great Senate this year."

spends on athletics and channeling money instead from such areas as ticket sales and private giving would save a substantial sum of money.

"If UMass Amherst were to spend at the peer average," the report stated, "it would reduce expenditures in this area by nearly $8 million.

Hugus also referred to the finding that while UMass is above the average of its peers on institutional spending towards athletics, the report also brought to light the reality that it spends about $215 less per student on academic support and as much as $325 less per student on instruction and research.

"What I'm concerned about is that it's being done at the expense of the academic mission," Hugus said.

Total revenues per student and total spending per student by the University were found to be about equal to that of the same schools.

Joyce Hatch, Associate Vice Chancellor for Finance and Budget as well as Budget Director, declined to comment on the report, which she will present at the meeting.

The Rules Committee has added a motion to the agenda in response to the findings.

"[T]he Faculty Senate [will] urge the university and campus administration," the Faculty Senate Office said in a press release last week, "to commence immediately to correct the imbalances shown in the report...by shifting expenditures back to core academic categories."

The Faculty Senate will convene at 3:30 p.m. in Herter 227.

Impossibilities

We can only be so safe

A statement from a United States official in the Middle East yesterday brought to light the fact that acts of terrorism against the U.S. had been anticipated by the government for some time.

"We had anticipated attacks," the official said. "If you look back over the last year, there were ever-increasing warnings... yes, we knew something was happening. No, we didn't know it was Manhattan."

Of course nobody did, except those responsible for bringing down planes into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and in Pennsylvania. It's what terrorism is rooted in; secrecy. Operating under a veil so thick that our government, our people, can't see it until any form of reaction comes too late.

Some criticism of the United States has attacked this very point; that we didn't see anything coming, that what we did manage to see wasn't enough, and that our policies designed to prevent such tragedy failed many times over.

Fair enough.

How, then, are we supposed to seal ourselves off? Is it even an option? How do we deal with foreign attacks when a storm could be brewing within our own borders?

We can't. To cover every option, every possibility, every potential breach of our safety is impossible. For every road that we pursue, there are countless left unwatched, regardless of the policies and efforts we dispatch to prevent that.

The question then becomes a matter of how we deal with that reality. Having seen tragedy, having heard admissions from our government that they are aware of the tides rising against us, and simply having the sense to follow the news and form our own opinions of what's going on, how do we get through it?

By doing what we did on September 10th, and all the days before it. Keep what has happened in mind, and encourage discussion, but don't feel bad about living the life you were before. Enjoy the simple things. Family, friends and yes, even the entertainment world, for what it's worth. Don't consider the political side-affects of your favorite show or film because that's what the news is doing. Take it in, digest, and move on.

We're all left feeling like we should do something, and we should: for ourselves and each other. By getting back to the basics that we freely enjoyed before our foundation was rocked, we can move toward establishing a normalcy, however different it now will be.

Information from CNN.com was used in this story.

Good Morning America:

We're still individuals

Some day really soon I'm going to get the piss beat out of me, and most of you will probably think that I'll have deserved it.

I figure it'll go something like this:

A guy, or group of guys, or co-educational group of people, all wearing flag accessories, will be talking with me about the war, and George Bush, and domestic anti-terrorism tactics, and I'll say something along the following lines:

"I'm not going to go fight this war. I—k that."

"George Bush is still an idiot. Now he has armies to play with."

"The scariest thing of all about what's happened is all this throwing away of civil liberties. When it's your relative who's being held indefinitely without trial you won't think it's quite so great."

And then, a few hours later, I'll wake up in a dumpster or under a bush with dog crap forced into my mouth.

That's the way things seem to be going these days. The all-for-one, one-for-all, "Either you're with America or you're with the terrorists" sort of sentiment is permeating every aspect of society.

I'm not a fan of that sort of thing. I'm not going to strap dynamite to my chest or anything, but there are times aplenty when I'm definitely not with America at all.

So I guess I'm a terrorist. There is absolutely no difference between me and the men who flew planes into buildings. None. We are one and the same. Or so the logic goes.

Not wanting to kill more people in return for people being killed is the same as being a murderer. Questioning the actions of my government equals attempting to violently overthrow it. Mocking the president is identical to shooting him in the head. Wanting to keep my freedom is the epitome of hating all American freedoms. I'm such a bad man.

And I really do feel that way. I do not trust the men and women who are in charge of this county with the massive amounts of power that they have and with the yet greater powers they may yet receive. A good amount of people are going to die, and a good amount of people are going to have their lives destroyed or simply infringed upon, and no one's going to be allowed to talk about it, and it's going to be everyone's fault.

> "The all-for-one, one-for-all, "Either you're with America or you're with the terrorists" sort of sentiment is permeating every aspect of society."

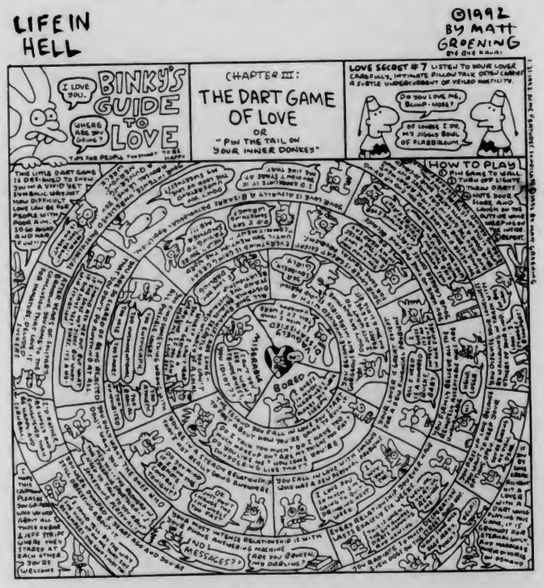
I'm not going to fall in line, though. My sister was a cheerleader in high school, not me.

When I first thought about writing this, I was afraid to do so. That was the very reason that I decided that I didn't have a choice, that I had to put this out there with my name and my face on it. If I'm scared of the negative reaction that I'm going to get from saying something that seems perfectly reasonable to me, than it probably has to be said.

No one in this country should ever be afraid of speaking his or her mind. No one should have to worry about violence or ostracizing as a result of government criticism. I don't care how much you love your country. I don't care how many flag stickers you have on your Jetta. If you love the ideals of America, the concept of it, and not just the mindless daddy-knows-best mentality, then you'll agree that what I'm saying is important. Even if you disagree with me.



The mob rule and mindless, unquestioning patriotism that's covering every aspect of society is frightening. Bill Maher, a comedian for chrissakes, is being scolded by the White House and told to watch his mouth for daring to question Bush. The ACLU and anyone who, like me, opposes the expansion of government powers of surveillance, detention and speech restrictions is un-American; we're not on the team. Anyone who has the urge to speak out against what we as a people are doing places themselves in the path of a bulldozer of mindless fervor – not the way it should be.

It was when I was at a metal show this weekend and someone who dared say something to some idiot bigot who screamed "F—k the ragheads!" was promptly handed his ass by the crowd that it really came home. Enough is enough.

You want some? Here I am. I, Robert John Patrick Schultze, think that we should not give Bush his anti-terrorism package, we should not go to war in Asia, and we should definitely have the right to say so, loud and clear.

Suck on that.

Root for Bonds; Root for history

Why won't you root for Barry?

Hey, maybe y'all missed it. There's this guy chasing history.

And maybe you've heard of him, his name is Barry Bonds. He's this baseball player on a team that plays in San Francisco. Pretty damn good ballplayer, too.

Why does no one care? Barry Bonds is chasing one of baseball's most fun records. He's been smashing dinger after dinger into oblivion, and a decent amount of them have been landing in the San Francisco Bay. I and masses can't even hold this guy anymore. Barry's shots these days are bound for McCovey Cove, a nice little place to fish if you don't mind getting pelted with moon-shot baseballs. Not that anyone cares.

Bonds has four games left after last night to break the record. Nobody gives a fig. Even though Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa were everyone's buddies three seasons ago when they went head to head to break the very same record, no one wants to give Barry more than a second sniff.

I think I know why. Barry's got this reputation, you see. He's never killed anyone, but people don't like Barry. It's something about him needing an attitude adjustment. A lot of people don't think Barry is worthy of breaking a record that has names like Mays, Ruth, and McGwire attached to it. "Too much of a jerk," people, specifically sportswriters intent on souring the general public toward him, grumble.

Why is that? Bonds has a personality quirk that bothers people. It's called individuality. A lot of people don't like Barry Bonds because he acts with personality on the field. If he hits a monster homerun, he admires it on its way out. If the other team cracks a dinger over his head while he's playing the field, he acknowledges it by, well, not acknowledging it. He doesn't even turn to see where the ball is going to go, and that tends to occasionally ruffle some feathers. Personally, I find the habit pretty darn amusing. It's a form of showmanship, let it be. Baseball shouldn't be bland.

Barry irritates sportswriters by blowing them off from time to time. The sportswriters in turn irritate sports fans with exaggerations of how much of a jerk Bonds is. In the end, the result is that a lot of people do not really understand or like Barry Bonds at all. You know what? Day after day, I'd get sick of them pansies little sportswriter vultures, too. "Go stick your microphone somewhere else, already," Bonds clearly says. "I gotta go meet my family."

I have a hard time faulting the guy. My face would say worse.

All of my life, I have been taught that people should be judged on the merits of two things: their character and their work ethic. Barry's got them both. As his body has aged through more than sixteen major league level seasons he's developed and made the necessary adjustments to remain successful. That's not fluke that's hard work. As a rookie in 1986, 180-pound Barry Bonds spent a fair amount of time as a speedy lead-off hitter. He could fly around the bases back in the day. This year, he's a hulking 225-pound beast. Rather than becoming a fat, slow, Tom Gwynn-kind-of-slap hitter, he beefed up and started smashing the snot out of baseballs. It didn't happen over night, and it took a lot of hard work to do it. Give Barry some props, whether you like him or not. The jerk's a hard worker, sorry to say.

As for his character, there's little negative that can be said. With Barry, it's the things that no one HAS heard that make the difference. He's never been in the news for molesting teenage girls, like Anthony Mason. He's never been before a court of law for cocaine possession, like Darryl Strawberry. And he has most certainly never had his hysterical wife call 911 while she tries to keep him from beating her in a drunken rage, like countless other meathead athletes/politicians/rock stars. How bad of a guy can he be? It's been reported in Sports Illustrated that he loves having goofy conversations with his kids via AOL Instant Messenger. What self-respecting man without a heart would do that?

So what. Barry Bonds is a little bit sour. He's like the grumpy uncle that you know deep down would love to take you fishing on Saturday morning if you just ask. He's the joyful Uncle Scrooge at the end of A Christmas Carol that is trying to hide the toys that he bought Tiny Tim because he doesn't want to seem to soft. Barry Bonds may be a little gruff and a little arrogant. But he's a decent dude. Root for him this weekend. You might even see the jerk crack a smile.

Proud to be a cranky yankee

When I die, I want to haunt New England. I love being a Yankee. Not a New York one, but a real one. Being a Yankee, a true New Englander, means that there are several truths and facts that come with living in the colonies.

First, New Englanders hate their neighbors. It's a fact of life. Every single one of us who was born here or who fully embraces New England has, on the genetic level, a deep burning hatred of anybody who lives close to us or our family.

While civilization has buried this urge to withdraw from the Idiots around us, it is not completely dead. In small towns, like the one I grew up in, we rarely speak to our neighbors once we hit 15. There's a reason Robert Frost wrote "Mending Wall." He was a New Englander. There's a reason there are stone walls crisscrossing the landscape. Walls mean keep the hell out.

We don't want anything to do with anyone else, and we're happy that way. In some parts of Maine, knocking on the wrong door will get you shot, and no one will shed any tears because you should have known better. I leave us alone. Its New England - we've had guns since the 1620s and we have no interest in anything that you are selling, petitioning, or otherwise pestering for.

Now, while we've stopped shooting trespassers like so many clay pigeons, DNA and Darwin insist that we be unfriendly to outsiders. If you're new to a town, don't expect anyone to really talk to you for the first two years. The clerks in stores will help you, maybe, but nobody will really take an interest in you until you've proven that you want to live here.

Yankees are also in a rush. Our Puritan and Pilgrim roots have done nothing more than put the fear of death and eternal damnation in the id of every one of us. Blue laws, regulation of vices and the simple fact that buckles on shoes haven't been in style for 375 years have left us a truly pissed off people. We don't want to talk to our grocery store bagger, and he doesn't want to talk to us. I want to get out of Shaw's so I can go to Dunkin' Donuts and get a coffee, so I can go home and read my Farmer's Almanac and drink said coffee next to my coffee maker.

And the bag boy doesn't want to talk to me. He wants me to get my damn groceries out his face so he can go back to counting the seconds before his shift ends and he can go meet that cute girl from the deli in the stock room for some serious commandment breaking.

We drink bitter beer, or so my friend tells us, and it turns us into bitter people. I say this is twisted around. We make bitter beer because we want to drink something as bitter as we are. And you know what? We like being bitter. We like it, on some weird level, and in some strange twist of psychology that scientists are still struggling to define, being bitter makes us happy.

Nothing gives me more pleasure than to sip my Sam Adams Oktoberfest and watch the leaves fall off the trees, the Red Sox blow another season, Bledsoe get sacked more times than oats, and then welcome six or eight feet of snow for six months.

I know God is a Yankee at heart. Why else would we have rules against having fun? Why else would there be a Hell?

I'm sure that the Almighty will grant my request, so following my death bed confession, I will be floating around the Big Dig and listening in pleasure as everyone drops their R's and talks the way people should.

And tourists to our little slice of heaven just don't get it. When will the rest of the country learn? Sure has two syllables, the Cape is only for tourists, and you can't get there from he-ah. The true bounty of the Atlantic is not Is beautiful beaches and relaxation, it's the Grand Banks. It's clamming in Rhode Island, lobster in Maine and cod fishing everywhere else. A Yankee who doesn't like seafood is considered strange, and every southeastern New England male, at one point or another, when out of work, turns to the bounty of the shore to make a living.

Finally, Yankees are slow to change, and we are always completely sure that things better back in the old days. Our parents walked uphill both ways to school, our grandparents had to tunnel through hills to school, and our great grandparents used to routinely cross large ice packs as glaciers drifted down the street, and do you think they had snow days? Huh? Do you? Whippersnapper.

I don't like the changes at the Bluewall, and I'm certain at some point this semester I'll be in a rocking chair talking about these kids today and their damn smoothies. When I was a freshman we didn't have smoothies. The Bluewall people would throw the fruit at you and you were happy to get it, dagnabit.

Yankees will always be lovably cantankerous. Fifty years from now I hope to be among the Swamp Yankee curmudgeons, despising my neighbors, and swearing at the radio after Lowe blows yet another save.

And loving every minute of it.

The Orange Goblin

Mr. Nanny, Mr. Satan

By Shauna Billings
Collegian Staff

MR. NANNY (1993)
Directed by Satan Himself
Starring Hulk Hogan and the 24-inch Pythons

Forget The Godfather and forget Casablanca: Hulk Hogan in a pink tutu - there's nothing more Oscar worthy than that. This cinematic classic, Mr. Nanny, is a difficult one to find in the local video stores, while neither Video to Go nor Blockbuster carry it, or for that matter carry many Hogan flicks. But, students of UMass, you are in luck. Housing Services Cable Network will be showing Mr. Nanny on its movie channels this October. Strongly consider skipping class for this one kids!

In Mr. Nanny, the Hulk plays a former wrestler (this was probably a difficult stretch for Hogan, after such serious roles in Suburban Commando and Rocky III) who takes a job as a bodyguard for two children. The magic is that those little imps just got their nanny to quit, so Hogan finds himself in a double-duty situation, acting as nanny and bodyguard. Of course, quasi-hilarious shenanigans ensue, as the wrestler finds that he may be able to save the kids from a villainous kidnapper, but who will save him from two spunky youngsters?

The tagline for the film is - "He's big, he's bad and he's babysitting. He doesn't stand a chance." More like the film (heck, we can't even call it a film - scratch that and call it movie) doesn't stand a chance. The gist of the movie is - Hogan gets electrocuted, heavy object falls upon his head, children run amuck, he gets soaked, he sings a lullaby and kisses a dolly, he beats up bad guys in aforementioned pink tutu, children improve, he reunites father and children, The End. It almost makes sense on paper, but trust me, it doesn't make Hogan blows!

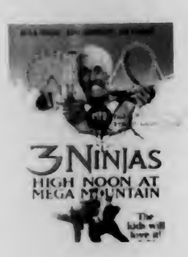
Guess what. I hate Hulk Hogan. Even when I was ten years old and all of the other kids in school and in the neighborhood liked him. I didn't. Sure, the other kids yelled me at when I cheered when Earthquake sat on him, or when Yokozuna burned him with a fireball and won the belt. I didn't care. I hated Hulk Hogan then and I do now.

My dislike for Hogan stems from several things. For one, growing up I was a Ric Flair fan. That's right, I didn't like big, muscled-up Hulk Hogan. I liked a man's man, like Ric Flair, who wore pink fluffy robes and went "woo." The guy who made all the girls "ride Space Mountain." But who got all the mainstream attention? Hogan, that's who. You see Flair was from WCW, not the WWF circus that Hogan was a part of, so nobody cared about him outside of the Bible belt.

While Flair could put on awesome matches that often lasted a half-hour or longer, Hogan was out of breath within 5 minutes, and knew how to execute about three moves. Flair was a wrestler, Hogan was a steroided pansy.



When Flair came to the WWF, Hogan refused to lose to him (wrestling being fake and all). This was part of a trend where Hogan refused to job (wrestling term for losing a match), because he didn't want to establish any new stars who might challenge him for his top spot, and his paycheck.

Hogan eventually helped to kill WCW off to the point that it is completely out of business. By pushing his old self and his old friends at the expense of the younger talent that the fans wanted to see, people got so fed up with WCW that they simply stopped watching it. Nobody wanted to see old decrepit Hulk Hogan walk around slapping people with his belt, dropping his leg, and scratching his opponents back. Today, Vince McMahon "owns" WCW, but really it is just a part of the WWF. WCW is dead. Thanks to Hulk Hogan.

Now there are rumors that Hogan wants to start up his own wrestling promotion. Like anybody wants to see that. Hulk Hogan, you blow! You have the most pathetic haircut of any man on earth. Your skin is orange. You shouldn't be classified as black or white, but rather as orange. You are a worse wrestler than the worst rookies at wrestling school are. Hang up your yellow tights - which match the streak down your back - and call it a career. Go into acting or something. Oh, I forgot, you can't do that either.

Three Ninjas: High Noon at Mega Mountain opens with the three title characters (Rocky, Colt, and Tum-Tum) running a hideous gantlet for the amusement of sadist/trainer/grandfather which whom they are spending the summer.

After surviving the horrors, the group goes back into their bare, death camp-style room to talk about their wasted summer. Here, Rocky (or possibly Colt) lays bare that, now that he's fifteen, he has no need for the dark arts of ninjitsu, but would rather hang out with chicks on the beach. This instills horror in his brothers, who want nothing more than to have poison-tipped spears thrown at them by their hideous paterfamilias forevermore, but Rocky (or possibly Colt) is adamant: he's gonna get laid.

To this end, he goes to the Mega Mountain amusement park with his brothers, a date, and geeky computer-and-special-effects whiz neighbor Amanda. Colt (or possibly Rocky) and his chick go off to fumble to second base on the Tilt-A-Whirl, while the other three go to witness the farewell performance of Dave Dragon, a TV superhero played by leathery bald fossil Hulk Hogan.

Tragedy ensues when Medusa (Toni Anderson) and Lothar (the late Jim Varney) (yes, that's right - Earnest goes to Mega Mountain to Kill Children) come to take over the park and hold all its inhabitants hostage for 10 million dollars. Their motley crew of sunglass-wearing dudes includes a Rastafarian, three incompetent nephews, and a guy named Lars with a hideous Prusso-Brandenburg accent.

Varney immediately shoots Hogan with a dart, rendering him unconscious in the first of many disgraces for the gelatinous mammountain.

Realizing their dire peril, the Ninjas and Amanda come together the fight the stereotypes with insanely horrible fighting and truly hideous implements of death that

No Holds Hogan

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

If one film can be described as launching the legendary acting career of one Hulk Hogan, the 1989 cult classic No Holds Barred is it. With a riveting plot, witty comedy, and breathtaking action scenes, this film will likely go down in the annals as the most daring portrayal of professional wrestling ever seen on the big screen.

Just kidding. This film, like Hogan's career, is a joke. Released in 1989, at the tail end of "Hulkamania," (although Hogan is convinced Hulkamania is still alive and well) Hogan portrays a wrestler (there's a stretch) named "Rip." An evil television executive on a rival network (Kurt Fuller) who hates Rip, since he wouldn't "sell out," decides to make his own wrestling promotion for his network. His champion is a hearty 7-foot monster of a man named Zeus (Tiny Lister). And guess what? Rip and Zeus end up fighting each other. Before that there are tons of wild shenanigans including Rip's brother getting beat up and put into a wheelchair by Zeus. That motivates the Ripster to take on Zeus. Of course he has to battle him on the rival network selling his soul in the process (nothing new for Hogan).

Hogan's acting ability, like his wrestling skills, leaves quite a bit to be desired in No Holds Barred. The only positive is that the character Hogan plays is a carbon copy of his "Hulkster" wrestling persona. There are a few scenes that he pulls of that actually require some minimal level of acting skill. For one, it is rather funny to see him in a fancy restaurant insisting on ordering a "hot dog." On the other hand, it is not funny at all watching him trying to pull off a "make out" scene.

The wrestling scenes in the movie are far from dazzling as well. Hogan shows of his three moves of doom: punch, big boot, and legdrop. Zeus is horrible, and looks like he should have spent more time learning how to wrestle in between steroid cycles.

To keep one's self entertained while watching, be on the

Me Hulkamaniac

Before there was the Rock, before Steve Austin was even Pebble Cool, there was the Hulkster.

Ah, memories. Sweet, sweet childhood weekends, sitting on the floor of my friends Kevin and Jimmy's house, watching the WWF Rock 'N' Wrestling on Saturday mornings and on Sunday's it was time for WWF Superstars of wrestling. Oh, yeah. Watching promos, there was one man who commanded all of my attention: Hulk Hogan. Wearing red and gold he was fire personified. He lit up the ring and our young minds when he leg dropped the Iron Sheik, or when he body slammed Andre the Giant.

His antics on the cartoon show entertained us and made us laugh, and when he hulked up, we all knew truth, justice, and the American way was ready to kick some ass.

And we were all good little Hulkamaniacs, saying our prayers, taking our vitamins, and then proceeding to kick the crap out of each other like we had just seen on TV.

We'd all try and do the signature moves of our favorite wrestlers, and for me, that was Hulk's leg drop. We'd beat the hell out of each other for a good couple of hours, then go play wiffle ball. But all the while, we asked ourselves, "who is Hulk Hogan?"

We asked this because Hulk was more than just a wrestler to us. He was a role model. Like so many other children of the 1980's who were too young for John Hughes, we took our cues from Hulk Hogan, Captain Lou Albano and the Junkyard Dog. We tried to emulate their ways: strong, but only fighting for the little guy, never being the bully. Bullies were not cool in the Hulkster's eyes.

And when he wasn't tossing around people like rag dolls, Hogan's movies showed us his range as an actor. From playing the tough, but likable alien soldier in Suburban Commando to playing the tough, but likable babysitter in Mr. Nanny, Hogan proved himself as a master thespian, a true artiste in film. His television appear-sense on celluloid. And let's not forget that the bad guy has a metal plate on his face. Just in case Hogan had a little trouble trying to figure out who is the actual villain, the big metal face (which to unimaginative director Michael Gottlieb is an obvious indicator of evil) should help him figure it out. But please, let us not blame the Hulk for the poor writing and predictable bowling balls falling from closets - Hogan is just a big-gunned pawn in the directing world of Gottlieb.

Mr. Nanny is a classic - a classic that the desk guy at Video to Go said is "A classic if you're drunk." Note though, not all feel the way Videoboy feels - Yahoo videos gave this classic five stars and stated "An uproarious laugh-packed comedy about a former pro-wrestler battling the most dangerous, most devious, most destructive adversaries imaginable - kids!" (I just wonder if they give every video five stars, since they're selling them. But that's another thought for another day.) And anyway, it must be good - the Hulk wouldn't put his stamp of approval on just anything. If you go into the movie expecting comedic brilliance and superior cinematography - you'll be disappointed. If you go into the movie with nothing but adoration for the Hulk - or Hollywood Hogan as he later preferred to be called - you'll love it!

For an added bonus, in classic WWF style, fellow wrestlers make appearances in the movie. George "The Animal" Steele, Brutus Beefcake and Ala "Alfa" Anoai all star as themselves, which is enough to delight any old-school wrestling fan. The only question left on viewers' lips is "Where are my boys Junkyard Dog and the Sheik?"

Mr. Nanny was an attempt by studio execs to broaden Hogan's Hollywood horizons with a kinder, gentler image. Hulk, my friend, your horizons are broad enough already. While this movie revealed your nurturing/sensitive side, your legacy will be in your silky blond tresses and protruding vein-laced muscles. But to true Hulk Hogan fans, Hogan in a tutu will always touch a warm spot in our hearts.

■ Hogan

ances were also memorable.

He played hard-to-define characters like "Himself" in the A Team and Suddenly Susan, and who can forget his stunning portrayal in a very special Walker, Texas Ranger.

But his true calling was in the ring. Taking on any bad guy, protecting the weak, and helping those in need. Hogan was the classic good guy. But things change, and people grow. We forget, as children tend to do and moved on to other heroes and role models. To me, the Hulk was always a good guy, a man who made wrestling fun to watch.

And then, tragically, it was over. Hulk Hogan, our role model, the guy would always do the right thing admitted to using steroids.

Say it ain't so, Hulk.

It was dark time for me. I wandered, lost, without direction, trying to figure out what to do with my life. And then, a glimmer of hope emerged.

Hulk joined the WCW.

The news was out, and life was good.

Or so we thought. Hulk Hogan was back, it was true, but it wasn't the Hulkster we all knew and loved. He was a heel.

The day Hulk went Hollywood was the day that the chalk line was drawn around Hulkamania and all the little Hulkamaniacs were tagged and bagged.

As a heel, he was the antithesis of all that the Hulkster had taught us. His colors? Not the friendly and bright red and gold, but the despondent and evil black.

Hulk Hogan took all our hopes and crushed them. He betrayed all the Hulkamaniacs and hurt us deeply.

But we still have our sweet memories. The true Hulkamaniacs keep the faith. There is good in Hogan yet, and one day, the Hulkster will return to reclaim his throne, and there will be a final battle between good and evil, and all non-believers will be cast down with the McMahon, and then there will 1000 years of peace.

But for now, life goes on. And anytime I'm feeling low, whenever I'm thinking about what to do next, I'll always remember what the Hulkster taught me.

Say your prayers, take your vitamins and you will never go wrong.

Ain't that the truth?

■ Ninjas

Amanda just happened to have in her pocket. (Sample stomach-turning devices: razor-sharp playing cards and a yo-yo which sprouts three rotating, flesh-eating blades.)

Meanwhile, a revived Hogan commandeers a bunny suit and attempts to stop the madness. He gets his ass kicked by Anderson. And then again in the next scene. And then again in the next scene. It's almost like this film was designed to make the Hulkster look weak and ineffective next to three puke kids, and it works like magic.

Eventually Varnes decided to lure the ninjas out of hiding by using Rocks - (Colt's) girlfriend to a cabin cooler (rack unless he saves her). When the hero shows up, Earnest decides that the best way to kill a preteen is not to shoot him with the wide variety of automatic weapons available to him, but instead to hack him to pieces with a katana sword. In the end, the girl is saved, and her and the interchangeable ninja share a passionate on-screen kiss, thus making Three Ninjas: High Noon at Mega Mountain a classic for Earnest, WWF, and illegal preteen porn fans alike.

Hulkster then redeems himself by thrusting his decaying hulk through a rotted wooden fence, freeing upwards of a dozen hostages and knocking his wig off.

The highlights of the last fifteen minutes of the movie are Hulk getting tasered unconscious again by Anderson, the ninjas fighting adults with literally their eyes closed and winning, and a boat blowing up for no apparent reason, which leads to the foiling of the plot and Anderson's return to Old-Ass Skank Prison.

Dave Dragon gets his job back and hit on by a reporter because the ninjas take pity on him and give him all the credit, when his most impressive feat throughout the film was only being destroyed every ten minutes rather than every five.

Then grandpa reappears out of literally nowhere with a cake for Tum-Tum to the accompaniment of laughter.

This story is written in respectful memory of Jim Varney and Earnest Saves Christmas, undoubtedly one of the greatest stories ever written.

Jazz legend at UMass

By Ian Beck
Collegian Correspondent

Ladies and Gentleman, we are in the presence of unbridled genius. Herbie Hancock is coming to UMass tonight to perform a tribute to Miles Davis and John Coltrane, and it's going to be one hell of a show. The repertoire for tonight includes not just covers of Davis tunes, but total re-workings, so if you've got yourself a ticket, expect to hear jazz of the highest caliber.

The quintet led by Hancock also features Roy Hargrove on trumpet, and Michael Brecker on saxophone. John Patitucci, who's played with the likes of Chick Corea and Wayne Shorter, will be playing upright bass. And last, but not least, Brian Blade whose "client" list includes Joni Mitchell and Joshua Redman, will be playing drums. But enough about that, it's time for a history lesson on Herbie Hancock.

Herbie Hancock

Herbie Hancock was born in 1940 and began playing piano at home in Chicago when he was seven years old. Two years later, he gave his first public performance, and shortly after that performed D Major Piano Concerto by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart with The Chicago Symphony. Did I mention that he was also a child prodigy? Somewhere around the age of thirteen, he graduated from Grinnell College in Iowa with a degree in engineering.

At the age of twenty, Hancock moved to New York City and began playing with trumpet player Donald Byrd. Byrd helped him get his first record deal and soon enough Hancock record Takin' Off. Shortly thereafter, Hancock was taken under the wing of Miles Davis, whom invited him into his quintet. There, he was quickly introduced to a type of music called funk, which he developed a poignant taste for.

When he left Davis' group, he formed his own sextet, called the Headhunters, and recorded one of the greatest jazz albums in history, Headhunters. This album had what could be called Hancock's most famous song "Chameleon," a jazz/funk/rock tune that transcends genres. With the help of the Headhunters, Herbie pioneered what is now known as jazz fusion a genre that could be described as electric-soul-jazz, and summed up in two words as: Damn smooth.

Herbie Hancock is on top of the list as one of the greatest jazz pianists ever to live. Not all of his music is as funkalicious as what he's best known for, though, his versatility ranges all over the place, and tonight we're going to see him in rare form.

5 Essential Herbie Hancock Albums

Headhunters- Mentioned above, this is THE Herbie Hancock album. If you don't appreciate jazz, you will appreciate this. It features the song "Chameleon" and is perhaps the lushest, funky, jazz recordings available.

An Evening With Herbie Hancock and Chick Corea- An album that captures him at the top of his game. The only instruments you'll hear on this are two pianos; however, don't let something so simple turn you off, this album has more texture than a Dave Matthews album.

Gershwin's World- This is not just a tribute to George Gershwin, this an epic work of worship. It includes "Concerto For Piano And Orchestra In G," "Summertime," and "It Ain't Necessarily So." This album is for anyone interested in Hancock's inspirations as well as someone who might be interested in getting into Gershwin.

Speak Like A Child- I'd like to call it Herbie Unplugged. This is album is the other side of Hancock; it shows more emotion than Headhunters and is more traditional. Though it's on the other side of musical spectrum its probably some of the best most straightforward jazz he's ever written.

A Jazz Collection- If you're scared to wet your feet with the other albums listed, this one's most likely for you. It's a sampler of Herbie Hancock's work, his Pu-Pu platter if you will. This album would be easy to get into if you don't know where to start off, the musical spectrum is broad, and the melodies are profound.

That being said, if you weren't psyched for the show before, you should be now, because it's not everyday that we're able to see jazz legends like this in concert.

look out for a few cameos. Namely, the current Governor of Minnesota, Jesse "The Body" Ventura who appears as an announcer at the films outset. Former WWF announcer "Mean Gene" Okerland appears in the same capacity in a rare sober moment for him. Also, Vince McMahon himself was the executive producer, although he never appears in the film.

The most notable aspect of this film is that the storylines in the WWF in 1989 were centered around the movie Hogan and Zeus engaged in a "feud" stemming from the film. Unfortunately, Zeus didn't have the slightest clue how to wrestle, and he only had a handful of WWF matches during his tenure. However, if one could hunt down a copy of "Summerslam 89" or "Survivor Series 89," they would see Hogan and Zeus on opposite tag teams, and the two do battle for real (well, sort of).

The scariest thing about No Holds Barred is that it is, in this humble journalist's opinion, the second best film that Hogan was ever in (Suburban Commando being the best). Overall, it comes in behind Beyond The Mat and Wrestling with Shadows, making it the third best wrestling movie ever made (sorry, Ready To Rumble and Bodyslam). Since the above-mentioned movies are both documentaries, this makes No Hold Barred the best fictional wrestling movie ever, which isn't saying much.

Mr. Fancypants on fast track to Mystery Train

Ad Frank's Mr. Fancypants is a well-intentioned, misguided album.

By Serge Pinsky
Collegian Correspondent

AD FRANK
Mr. Fancypants
Stop, Pop, and Roll

As the title implies, Ad Frank's recent album Mr. Fancypants is hilarious. Being new to the whole music critic world, I give each album that I am assigned a lot of hope and optimism. And often, I find myself rewarded with a good album that shows off the artist's skills and compassionate song-writing abilities. This is not one of those albums.

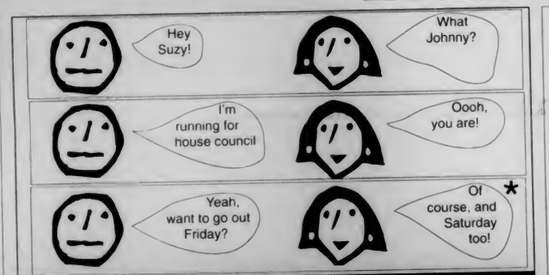
That's not to say that every song here is terrible; a few of them are actually decent. "U-Hauls & Ryders" brings to mind a breezy Blur tune with a strong Smiths influence. In fact, at first I suspected that this album was a comeback pseudo-Morrissey album, but then I got to track four.

Now before I tell you about track four (title: "The Ticket Was Non-Refundable"...my thoughts exactly), let me just say that I'm not a fan of dance music, not this kind anyways. Track four brings to mind names such as Erasure, New Order, and Depeche Mode at their most embarrassing (songs that I'm betting they didn't play on their latest tour). But strangely, the next track "Bay of Fundy," is a poignant song where Frank contemplates suicide after a breakup ("she's wanting me out of her life, I'm wanting out of mine too") has one the albums few great lines: "I'm not afraid of drowning because I'll probably die of embarrassment first." This is the only somber song that works on this album; the rest are (as Jack Black would say) sad bastard music.

Most of the other songs on this album aren't worth mentioning since they sound like bad 1980's songs or in the case of "Leave Me in Tears," bad 80's covers. "Barking Up the Wrong Girl" has a chorus that is a direct rip-off of Michael Penn's long forgotten single "No Myth."

"I Can and I Will" is an awful dance-pop song with an opening that left me laughing so hard that I missed the next two tracks because I had to get a tissue from the bathroom. I haven't laughed that hard since I saw Styx in concert (Is it me or does Tommy Shaw look just like David Spade circa Joe Dirt?!)

Ultimately, the cheesy production of this album and the un-inspired songs (some of which have great titles like "Last Night Mark Fitzel Saved My Life" or the Morrissey-like "I Have Seen the Moment of My Greatness Flicker") leaves much to be desired from Ad Frank, despite repeated references to masochistic martyrs ("Are you out there, Morrissey? Someone is out here wearing your fancy pants and getting them dirty"). Ad Frank should stop paying homage to (simply copying) mostly forgotten 80's bands, some of which deserve better than being an influence for crap like this. If Frank wants to make a good album, he should stop being nostalgic about the 1980s (easily the worst decade for music...except for Tiffany, she's cool) and write songs that don't sound like rehashed indie classics that no one really likes anymore. Mr. Frank, perhaps it's time to put some real pants on.



On a side note, I will be selling this album to Mystery Train very soon, so if you miss the days when The Smiths and Depeche Mode still had it, go and get yourself a copy of their CDs and not this one. You never know, the 80s might come back, but hopefully Ad Frank won't. If I haven't yet made myself clear, Ad Frank's Mr. Fancypants is an act of terror and should be considered hostile.

Kurt opens the mailbag

After one month of Tube Notes columns, the email has begun to flood to my official website: tubenotes.org. People have questions about the world of television, and people demand answers. This installment of Tube Notes is dedicated to answering some of these thoughtful emails. Remember, I can't possibly answer all emails, but know that I do read them all.

From: naked_richard_hutch@survivor.com

I am disgruntled at your lack of "Survivor" coverage in recent installments of "Tube Notes." Why are you omitting coverage of television's most popular program?

Dear Naked Richard,

Thanks for the email. I have omitted "Survivor" coverage simply because I am not a big fan of the show, and because there haven't been any new episodes lately. But let me tell you, I have some inside info on the upcoming season that was shot last summer in Kenya, and will begin airing on CBS October 11th. You heard it here first: my spies in Africa have informed me that Lex, a marketing manager from California, won the whole thing.

From: justin'sgt@britney.com

Dear Kurt,

I have always been a big fan of your work in The Collegian. Your commentary on such pertinent social issues as boybands has expanded my mind. Anyway, I'd like to know your opinion on Britney Spears' latest video "I'm a Slave For You." Also, is it true that she lost her Pepsi sponsorship? I just want you to know that Britney is my idol, and I want to look just like her when I grow up, which is why I have started on a one-meal-a-day diet of nothing but a glass of diet water.

Dear Justin's qt,

I gotta say, Britney's new video is hot, I like it. And man, what an empowering message for young woman to be told that they are "a slave" for men. And yes, you are right, Britney did lose her Pepsi sponsorship. There are conflicting reports as to why. Rumor has it that she was photographed drinking Coke last week, and Pepsi was so insulted that they ended their relationship with her (seriously). Publicly, Pepsi has stated that they ended their sponsorship deal with Britney because it would be "inappropriate in the wake of recent events." By recent events, I guess they mean the terrorist attacks on the U.S. So I guess Britney doing a strip tease with an American flag halter-top is no longer appropriate?

From wwfmark@wrestlemark.com

Dear Kurt,

I heard that you are a big wrestling fan, and that you were once in a backyard wrestling federation. So what do you think of "WWF Tough Enough" on MTV? Do you think Maven will make it big in the WWF?

Dear WWF Mark,

I enjoyed the first season of "Tough Enough." At least it was a reality show where people had a goal other than becoming filthy rich. The series was such a success that there is going to be a "Tough Enough 2" next summer. To answer your question Mark, it's hard to say whether Maven will make it in the WWF or not, but I think the WWF made a good choice with him. He will actually be making his debut tonight on UPN on WWF Smackdown! in a match versus Tazz. Having his first match on primetime national television surely puts him under big time pressure to perform. The rumors of my participation in a Backyard Wrestling promotion cannot be confirmed.

From mariahcarey@rubber_room.com

ggriogbjt8gbgloveu84mnospolebzruirskywo. Sorry. I just flipped out again. Kurt, I am emailing you in regards to the fact that I received a negative review of my new album Glitter in The Collegian from that other pop music writer. I heard that you were the only person on earth who actually enjoyed my song "Loverboy." Why can't you review my album? As you know my movie came in 11th place at the box office in its opening weekend, making it a colossal flop. But is that really that bad? I mean what was the 11th most watched TV show last week? I bet people don't consider that a failure. Anyway, email me back honey, and you'll always be my baby. xoxoxoxoxox

Tube Notes with Kurt Polesky

Dear Mariah,

I did like "Loverboy." I can't understand why everybody on earth hated it with such a passion. Unfortunately, being the 11th ranked movie and television program are two different things. The 11th most watched television program last week was "Monday Night Football," with an 11.7 rating. As for the most watched program last week, it was "Friends" with a 19.5.

From MikeD@prisonsong.gov

I was deeply saddened by your negative review of "Inside Schwartz" in a recent edition of Tube notes. The referee is a riot, as is the inimitable Mills Lane. I have it on good authority that you didn't even see the show when you wrote your scathing review. Now pardon me while I go listen to System of a Down.

Dear Mike D,

If you actually read Tube Notes last week, you would know that I specifically stated that I hadn't seen the show, and I was making a prediction as to whether the new shows would be any good or not. I did see part of the debut episode of "Inside Schwartz," and I have to say it wasn't as bad as I thought it would be.

From ILuvSut@comm.umass.edu

I am disgusted by your positive coverage of professional wrestling in Tube Notes. Don't you know that professional wrestling is responsible for violence in our society? Don't you know that the portrayal of large breasted women has a detrimental effect on the impressionable minds of both young boys and girls? Don't you know that advertising, along with nuclear holocaust, is the potentially most horrific thing in human history?

Dear ILuvSut,

I agree with you on all counts, but really don't care.

From LyonRenharris@cantonnews.com

Kurt, Tubenotes is trash every single week. Whatever happened to the good ol' days when Ryan Benharris wrote the column.

Dear Lyon,

Ryan Benharris has moved on to bigger and better things in the journalistic world. He no longer has time for this column that is allotted for people without the proper grammar skills to be an editor.

From TNNguy@aol.com

I just emailed you guys to say you are doing a great job. Keep up the good work. I collect all "Tube Notes" columns and re-read them daily. I was just wondering what the chances would be of obtaining Tube Notes merchandise, like perhaps a Tube Notes notebook, or Tube Notes Trapper Keeper.

Dear TNN guy,

Thanks for the kind words. Tube Notes gear is now available on our official website Tubenotes.org, which is updated several times daily. With the holidays coming up, what better gift for your loved ones than official Tube Notes gear. I'm talking Tube Notes hats, sweatshirts, boxer shorts (glow in the dark), lampshades, adult toys, and a slew of other items.

Anyway, keep the emails coming. See you next week.

Tamia and Dido both have songs remixed on the successful Totally Dance compilation.

U.S. slow to catch rising stars

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

VARIOUS ARTISTS
Totally Dance
Arista

Arista Records and Warner Music Group have come out with their answer to the hugely popular NOW CD series by releasing Totally Dance, a compilation of some of the year's biggest hits remixed by popular DJs.

The album doesn't contain the best dance songs of the past year, but is a remix collection of the year's biggest hits (whether they be slow songs or straight-up dance hits). But after perusing the song list on Totally Dance it seems Warner was looking to cash in the easy way, by tapping into the hit-hungry teens that have created a Billboard album chart infested with best-selling compilation albums. Capitalizing on this assessment, the album was released in conjunction with a TV direct-response campaign backed by massive cross-promotional marketing at retail and Internet.

But, like most compilation albums these days, by the time the album actually hits store shelves, the songs seem like yesterday's throwaway hits. Dream's "He Loves U Not (HQ2 Mix)," and Dido's "Thank You (Deep Dish Vocal Mix)," for instance, have seen their airplay heyday come and go.

It is the European hits that really accomplish this album's mission of setting the dance floor on fire. "Silence (Airscape Mix)" by Delerium is a true club-bopping smash. It's ability to morph Sarah McLachlan's voice from high-pitched squeals to whirling up-tempo grooves is, in itself, a gift a to the listener. And its trance-like rhythm and cathartic lyrics allow the track to rise as one of the best on the album.

A huge hit overseas, "Groovejet (If This Ain't Love)" by Spiller has a disco flavor spinning round and round, asking the repetitive question, "If this ain't love/ Why does it feel so good?" Its hypnotic effect sucks you in and truly begs the question why does this feel so good?

Darude (from Finland)'s "Sandstorm (Original Mix)" is one of the biggest club smashes to hit the states in years. Its lyric-free content is a testament to its power of arousing the most unremitting of dance-less souls and sending dance maestros into a virtual dance-floor orgy. Another smash is Tamia's "Stranger In My House (HQ2 Mix)." A fast beat, lacquered in Tamia's aggressive vocals, helps the song become another romper of a hit.

It's sad that America provides such a little outlet for dance music beyond the club scene. Even worse is America's hare-like pace at discovering these great songs - lagging behind Europe is a regular practice that the States have become all too eager to embrace. Darude's "Sandstorm" was a huge hit in the Euro clubs over a year ago, as were bopping "Touch Me" by Rui Da Silva (from the U.K.) featuring Cassandra, and the congenitally cute "Look At Us (Beam & Yanou Mix)" by Sarina Paris (from Italy). Also from Italy is Gigi D'Agostino with "I'll Fly With You (L'Amour Toujours)" which soars in its mono-rhythmic structure and stretched out lyrics.

Some Euro songs aren't without their faults either though. French Affair (from Germany) fail to lift "My Heart Goes Boom (La Di Da Da)" off the ground, therefore resulting in a grounded bang. Perhaps it's time to bid adieu to the use of "la," "di," or "da" as their overabundant use has become an all-too customary practice (Eiffel 65's annoying "Blue (Da Ba Dee)" instantly springs to mind). The use of these monosyllabic words does not automatically result in a fantastic song.

Totally Dance will appeal to any soul that likes to get up and boogie. As more than half the songs are conceived by overseas producers, however, it will make the fact all too apparent that Europe is a stalwart music empire while the U.S. is a feeble follower.

Robert Randolph steals show at Pearl St.

By Michael Carpenter
Collegian Correspondent

DEEP BANANA BLACKOUT
Pearl Street
September 26, 2001

Deep Banana Blackout has created a strong following in the jam band circuit. They continuously put on great shows, and last Wednesday at Pearl Street was no exception. They rocked the ballroom that night, and my friends and I left happy. They were the headliners, but the opening act ended up stealing the show. Robert Randolph and his Family Band opened with the most inspired pedal steel I have ever seen. At 23, Robert Randolph has already headed an album with John Medeski, and is a true pure talent.

Deep Banana Blackout is not your ordinary jam band. They concentrate heavily on a dirty, sexual funk beat most of the time. Many fans thought that Deep Banana would lose much of that with the recent departure of Jen Durkin on vocals. Well, they have picked up Hope Clayburn. Hope held her own on vocals and ripped it up on saxophone and flute. The bandleader is now definitely Fuzz. Fuzz is one of the better guitarists I have seen in the local scene, and he didn't disappoint. His influences are easily heard in his playing, which can change from a Frusciante funk to a Santana Latin guitar to a Duane Allman southern blast.

Everything in Deep Banana Blackout is held together by a tight rhythm section. Eric Kalb holds down drums and Johnny Durkin is the percussionist. They changed effortlessly from heavy funk to Latin groove without missing a beat. Benj LeFevre played some mean bass, and managed some sweet solo time. Cyrus Madan threw in a nice jazz influence on the keys. Rob Somerville and B. Smith handled saxophone and trombone, respectively. All of the horn players also spent some of their time singing.

It was a spirited show. The crowd danced the whole way through, even through the solos. The high point of the show was when Robert Randolph performed with Deep Banana Blackout. The jam turned into a frenzy of guitar hisirkenics over a sparse backdrop of a simple funk rhythm. Fuzz and Robert Randolph took turns trying to match each other. The cutting heads session ended with a tribute to the Allman Brothers, and Robert Randolph came away with some incredible interpretations. Deep Banana Blackout lost a little momentum when Robert left the stage, but picked it back up for the encore.

Robert Randolph. This kid is unreal. I have seen a few pure musicians in my short time, and he is one. He plays a custom made pedal steel guitar with 15 strings. For those unfamiliar with the pedal steel, it is an instrument with strings, without frets, that is set on a stand like a keyboard and played with a slide. His playing has been featured on "The Word" with Medeski. On that CD, however, his playing is much more subdued than at his live shows. Robert can use his pedal steel to sound like a guitar, but more often than not it will sound like a church organ, a gospel choir, or the lead gospel singer in the choir. It is this vocal aspect of his playing, and his love of playing that sets him apart. He ended his set with "I Don't Know What You Come To Do," an inspired piece that had the whole crowd stomping, clapping, and screaming along with different parts of the song.

Both bands this night had a whole lotta fun. Everybody danced the whole night long, and you could tell that both bands were low on the egos that can interfere with a good performance. To be honest with you all, this band isn't just a jam band. They are too much fun to lumped into that category. As for Robert Randolph, well, I count myself lucky to have seen him now. I sincerely hope this kid gets some national recognition.

Dayton, Duquesne face off in Div. I-AA matchup

By William Geoghegan
The Flyer News (U. Dayton)

(U-WIRE) DAYTON, Ohio - The Dayton football team has a chance to do something special this weekend — beat the No. 1 team in mid-major college football. The Flyers, ranked No. 2 by the Football Gazette and Sports Network, will travel to Pittsburgh Saturday to square off against Duquesne.

Every football fan loves a matchup between No. 1 and No. 2 and inevitably, any game pitting the two teams at the top of the polls draws major attention and receives quite a bit of hype. Things are no different for the Flyers and the Dukes. Despite the hype and excitement, UD head coach Mike Kelly said the team will not treat this game any differently. "We want to approach it as we would any other game," Kelly said. "We know it's being billed as the matchup between the two best teams, but I don't want us to get caught up in all of that. The team takes a little different approach than a fan would. We concentrate on ourselves and try not to look at the other team as No. 1."

Kelly said that while beating the No. 1 team would be a major accomplishment, it is more important for the Flyers to just keep winning no matter who the opponent is.

"What's really important is keeping our momentum going," Kelly said. "We need to be just a little bit better than we were last week and just keep improving with every game. We just want to play within ourselves and try to improve."

Kelly also pointed out that Duquesne is not a member of the Pioneer Football League, which makes this game somewhat less important than a conference game. We have two goals this year, to have a winning season and to win our league," Kelly said. "The league is our top priority, so this game goes more toward having a winning season. It's not like lining up for our first big league game." Both UD and Duquesne are 3-0 and have yet to play a close game. The Flyers pounded St. Francis 70-0 in the season opener, beat preseason No. 1 Robert Morris 37-9 and won last weekend against Morehead St. 42-22.

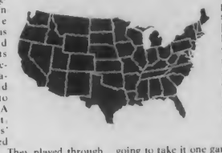
The results have been much the same for Duquesne. The Dukes beat Virginia Military Institute 41-18, topped St. Peter's 28-10, and last weekend took a 33-23 victory over Butler. According to Kelly, Duquesne is strong on all fronts.

"Their defense is dynamite, and they have a great offensive attack as well," Kelly said. "They're a very good football team."

The Dukes average 34 points per game and are led offensively by redshirt freshman quarterback Niel Loebig, who in his first three collegiate starts has completed 47-of-86 passes for 696 yards and eight touchdowns.

Loebig's favorite target has been wideout Jeremy Conley who has 16 catches for 285 yards and six touchdowns. On the ground, senior tailback Dante Small has rushed for 265 yards this season and needs less than 300 yards to become the school's all-time leading rusher. On defense, Duquesne allows an average of 281 yards per game and just 17 points per contest. The only defensive weakness for the Dukes is on the ground, where they have surrendered an average of 131 yards per game.

Despite Duquesne's impressive statistics, Kelly said both teams are fairly evenly matched and pointed to special teams as a key to the game. "In a game where the teams are even, special teams will be important," Kelly said. "We need to win the special teams battle. Not just the punters and kickers, but the special teams as a whole need to play well."



Kelly said Duquesne could have a slight advantage because Saturday's game will be UD's third straight on the road. "This is our third road game in a row so we have to make sure we keep our players fresh," he said. "That's a very important part of preparing for this game." The Flyers and Dukes will take to the field at 1:35 p.m. Saturday in Pittsburgh.

GW men's soccer shoots to top of A-10

By Stephen Bernard And Erica Merson
The GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – With Atlantic 10 conference play underway, both the George Washington men's and women's soccer teams have its sights set high. But this means something different for each team. The men's team wants to win the Atlantic 10 championship, which has room for only the top four conference teams. GW qualified for the tournament last year, but this year the Colonials are striving for more. And the GW women's soccer team, which failed to qualify for last year's tournament, wants to improve on last year's sixth place finish.

At the end of the conference season, the top four teams in the conference advance to the A-10 Championship. Last year, teams included Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Dayton and GW. Dayton and Massachusetts tied for the regular season conference title, but it was Rhode Island that won its second consecutive tournament and advanced to the NCAA Tournament. The Colonials' season ended in round one. They played through four overtimes before Dayton won it 5-4 in a shootout round.

The Colonials have said they are hungry to return and win the tournament. To do this, head coach George Lidster said the team will have to perform well in the early part of their schedule.

"Every game is going to be hard," Lidster said. The Colonials are set to host Richmond Saturday afternoon at the Mount Vernon field to open the conference season. Lidster said he considers Richmond the strongest team in the conference.

If the Colonials are to finish in the top four in the conference and earn a post-season birth, they will have to play strong from the beginning. GW's schedule includes three very difficult matches at the start.

"Our first three games are going to be really hard, and we've got to get something out of those three games," Lidster said.

The Colonials hope to use a 3-1 victory over Radford last Saturday as a springboard into conference play. Lidster said the win could help the team as the Colonials move onto conference play.

"We lost the momentum the last 20 minutes (of the game), but we still hung on to win. And that's important for a team to show character," Lidster said.

GW senior Michael Goldman said he believes the key for the Colonials is to play aggressive for the duration of the game. "We need to play the whole 90 minutes. We can't falter for five or ten minutes because that is when a good team is going to kill us," Goldman said. "Our goal: we plan on winning it (the conference championship)," said Senior Jason Holloway, who will return Saturday after missing four games with a hamstring injury. "We're just going to take it one game at a time. We plan on being in the A-10 finals and going to the NCAAs."

While the men's team is shooting to win the A-10, the women's team is looking to prove it is more than ready to contend for the A-10 title.

Although GW (2-3-0) has struggled the past two seasons, head coach Tanya Vogel said she believes this season will bring a dramatic improvement to the team.

"After we played Maryland, we realized we could compete with top 20 teams," Vogel said of GW's 2-0 loss in College Park, Md.

Like GW, Richmond (1-2) has had two games postponed or cancelled and heads into the conference season with a losing record. Richmond defeated Maryland for a win this season, which may indicate it is a stronger team than GW. Maryland defeated GW 2-0 on Sept 21.

Vogel said her team used September to improve and fine-tune the skills necessary to win. "We are better now than we were in preseason, and we're ready for October 5 for Xavier and Dayton."

QB decision looming for Kill, SIU

By Jay Schwab
Daily Egyptian (Southern Illinois U.)

(U-WIRE) CARBONDALE, Ill. - Part of being a coach is managing delicate egos, and SIU football head coach Jerry Kill will confront that chore this week.

Backup quarterback Kevin Kohe directed the SIU offense to three touchdowns after replacing Madei Williams in the second quarter of Saturday's 38-21 loss to Western Illinois. Now, Kill has to decide whether to stick with Williams or hand the ball to Kohe, who was 17-for-30 passing on Saturday. Either way, Kohe won't be happy.

"Anytime you're dealing with people, emotions are always important ... is it a touchy situation sometimes? Yes, certainly with Madei being a transfer and only having one year left, but I only know how to do it one way," Kill said. "No. 1, we're going to do what's best for the team. And No. 2, I'm going to be honest about it."

Conventional wisdom would say that Kohe is the front-runner to be SIU's new starter after his showing in Macomb. But Kill is leaving open the option of not publicly naming a starter before gametime.

"I got to thinking about it. We're going over to Afghanistan right now and we're not telling our special forces where we're going and those types of things ... we're playing Illinois State, and the less they know the better."

Ouch: As suspected by Kill after Saturday's physical game, the Salukis have received some unpleasant medical news. Tight end Ryan McAllister will be out of action for three or four games, and the same holds true for sophomore safety Andre Rockwell. Both have strained medial collateral ligaments in their knee. Kill was disheartened by the loss of McAllister, who gave the Salukis a broad receiving target in short yardage situations. He said McAllister's absence may spark SIU to continue the trend of utilizing running back Tom Koutsos more on passing downs.

Meanwhile, the loss of Rockwell shifts more responsibility to freshman safety Alexis Moreland, who has been a pleasant surprise for the Salukis so far.

MIA: Colin O'Reilly is one Saluki who so far has been conspicuous by his absence. O'Reilly, who redshirted at the University of Hawaii as a freshman last season before transferring to SIU, originally had an injured foot and is now nursing an ankle problem. Kill said Monday that O'Reilly is getting closer to being able to see playing time, but once his health returns to normal, O'Reilly will have a hard time seeing much action.

Center of attention: Offensive linemen are accustomed to toiling in anonymity, but Kill wanted to give special plaudits to center Mike Fritzler. Fritzler, a 6-foot-2-inch, 285 pound junior who transferred from Butler Community College, has done a solid job in anchoring an offensive line loaded with newcomers.

Kick in the butt: The start of the Western Illinois game was an exaggerated example of one of SIU's biggest problems. A short opening kickoff by Scott Everhart allowed WIU to set up shop near midfield, and it took the Leathernecks just one play to tally a touchdown on a 54-yard pass from Sam Clemons to Frisman Jackson.

The Saluki defense has been put at a continual disadvantage by other teams being able to work with a shortened field.

"Field position's killing us," Kill said. "Murray State's average starting deal was on the 40-yard-line, and in the Western game their average field position was on the 44. When you only have to go 60 yards to score a touchdown, it's not very darn hard to do."

But Kill would still like to see more out of punter David Grandt and Everhart. "We're losing the field position game in the kicking game, and that's got to get better to give us a better a chance," he said.

Eastern Conference triumvirate of power

Philadelphia Flyers

The Flyers are a perennial Eastern Conference powerhouse, but since the days of the Legion of Doom, they have not been able to reach the Stanley Cup Finals. Don't be a bit surprised if they make quite a run at Lord Stanley's hardware this year. Philly had a very strong team last year, but seemed to be missing something. They added that and more this offseason by signing free agent Jeremy Roenick and trading Eric "Puddin' head" Lindros to the Rangers for budding stars Ian Hlavac, Pavel Brendl and Kim Johnsson. Plus, they picked up Jiri Dopita, the best player outside the NHL last year, on draft weekend. Oh yeah, and they have a few other guys up front that you might have heard of – Mark Recchi, John LeClair, et al. The fact that they have a strong defense led by Eric Desjardins and Dan McGillis in front of last year's superrookie Roman Cechmanek makes the rest of the Eastern Conference shake in their boots.

New Jersey Devils

Last season, the Devils were one game away from bringing home hockey's ultimate prize for the second consecutive year. Instead, they came home with a bitter taste in their mouths – the feeling of beating themselves when push came to shove. Still, New Jersey has the deepest forward talent in the league, and aside from the loss of Alexander Mogilny to free agency, all the major players on this team are back. The Jason Arnott, Petr Sykora and Patrik Elias line (which I have dubbed the firing squad) might be the most cohesive, if not the best, line in the NHL. Scott Gomez and John Madden provide a nice youthful balance with the experience of Bobby Holik and Randy McKay on the lesser lines. But the defense is still the strongest part of this team. No team had a better top five last year, but Scott Stevens and Ken Daneyko aren't getting any younger, so the pressure will be on Scott Niedermayer and Brian Rafalski to step it up a notch. Martin Brodeur is still one of the top goalies in the NHL...and just signed a five-year extension with the team. If age doesn't catch up to them, the Devils should give the Flyers a run for their money in the East

Toronto Maple Leafs

The Maple Leafs have been among the upper echelon since Curtis Joseph came to the team. Coincidence? Not even close. Cujo is regarded as one of the best goalies in the game, but the value he brings to his team is unparalleled in the rest of the league. Gone are Sergei Berezin, Yanic Perrault, Steve Thomas and Igor Korolev. But arriving in their place are Mogilny, Mikael Renberg, Travis Green and Robert Reichel. Reichel and Renberg are both poised for comebacks and Mogilny replaces the speed lost from Berezin's departure. Add that to Mats Sundin and Gary Roberts and you have a scary set of forwards for opposing goaltenders. The Leafs big issue is their defense. Last year, the D let opponents fire at will and relied on Cujo. This year's D added Anders Eriksson, but lost Danny Markov and it now appears that budding star Tomas Kaberle will not start the season on time. Once again, Joseph is the make-or-break factor for this team...but that's nothing he's not used to.

Washington Capitals

The Capitals landed the free agent prize of the offseason this year by signing Jaromir Jagr to a major contract. He's joining a forward core with super sniper Peter Bondra, the best passer in the league in Adam Oates and a host of other veterans. So what's the catch? Well that would be Oates, who has made his unhappiness vocal in the offseason. If he's not back, the offense will suffer greatly. If he is, then Jagr will score 50 goals easily. Sergei Gonchar may be the best power play defenseman in the East, if not the world. Olaf Kolzig is still a superstar between the posts, and he is, much like Joseph, the key element to his team's success.

Ottawa Senators

After finishing second in the East last year and promptly exiting the playoffs courtesy a sweep at the hands of Toronto, one would think that the Senators would be reeling from such an embarrassing loss. Not so. The Sens went out and dealt Alexei Yashin on draft day in order to get future superstar Jason Spezza. Marian Hossa, Martin Havlat, Radek Bonk and Daniel Alfredsson all had strong seasons last year and all are primed to have another strong season. Spezza probably won't see much action this year, but his teammates up front will be looking forward to seeing him next year. Wade Redden is one of the most talented young bluelinemen in the league, and with Karel Rachunek ready to explode the defense should be strong in front of Patrick Lalime.

Buffalo Sabres

Talk about subtractions. We're not only talking about Dominik Hasek, here, either. Add to the list holdout Michael Peca, Steve Heinze, Doug Gilmour, Donald Audette and Dave Andreychuk. Still, this team has guys like Stu Barnes, who is one of the most underrated players in the league, and veterans Chris Gratton and Slava Kozlov. There are two factors on how this team performs. One is the young forwards, as guys like Maxim Afinogenov, J.P. Dumont and Tim Connolly all have the talent to be stars in the NHL. The second factor is Martin Biron, who is finally out of the shadow of Hasek.

Pittsburgh Penguins

The Penguins are certainly the biggest question mark in the East. I put them this high because they still have Super Mario. Not to mention the fact that he's not even on their number one line, which is made up of Martin Straka, Alexei Kovalev and Robert Lang. That line could prove one of the most dangerous in the East. Kris Beech may wind up playing on a line with Lemieux, and if he does, he'll ascend the ranks of NHL young stars very quickly. The team's defense should be better than it has been in the past. Ishan Hedberg will look to compete for the Calder after a strong postseason last year.

Carolina Hurricanes

All right, the Hurricanes don't really strike fear in the hearts of any team in the East, but they're always dark horses. Sami Kapanen and Jeff O'Neill both have the potential to score 40 goals this season. The main story is the defense. David Tanabe is a star-in-waiting and veterans Glen Wesley and Sandis Ozolinsh provide a spark up front. Arturs Irbe is still going to play a boatload of games, even with Tom Barrasso added in the offseason.

New York Rangers

The only reason the Rangers are here is on the potential that Eric Lindros plays a full season. This team is totally revamped, with much of the young forward talent gone and longtime team leader Adam Graves departed. The big three of Mark Messier, Brian Leetch and Mike Richter are still there and Theo Fleury should be a force assuming he's completely there mentally. Radek Dvorak and Petr Nedved add punch up front and Bryan Berard's return to the ice is the feel-good story of the year, assuming he makes it all the way back. Lindros could be the difference between the playoffs and the links.

New York Islanders

If ever the Islanders are going to make a move in the positive direction, this is certainly the year. They got their superstar in Yashin and they snatched up some strong veteran talent in Peca and defenseman Adrian Aucoin. Brad Isbister provides the grit up front as well as being a talented scorer, while Mariusz Czerkawski was a welcome surprise last season in leading the team in scoring. Kenny Jonsson and Roman Hamrlik are strong on D, while the additions of Chris Osgood and Garth Snow between the pipes provide a couple of veterans to help along youngster Rick DiPietro. All in all, the Isles could make the playoffs for the first time in a while.

Boston Bruins

Okay, so I'm going to catch flak for putting the Bruins this low. But the fact is, there are so many question marks around this team. Jason Allison's holdout will be pivotal in the team's success, whether he's traded or stays, but regardless the B's should be in contention for a playoff spot. Joe Thornton is not a bust, he's young...and he's going to be one of the best players in the NHL this year. Adding Martin LaPointe up front should help out the talented Thornton, Sergei Samsonov, Bill Guerin and Brian Rolston. Their cohesiveness, however, is still in question. Sean O'Donnell is not the defensive leader the Bruins need him to be, but anybody is a help to this core. Byron Dafoe should bounce back from a subpar injury-laden season.

Montreal Canadiens

The loss of Saku Koivu is going to hurt the Canadiens, and the NHL for that matter. Koivu's lymphoma is yet another bump in the center's rocky, injury-laden career. Brian Savage will score nine goals in the team's first ten games and then plummet to earth for the n-teenth time this season and the defense is simply a sieve leading to Jose Theodore.

Tampa Bay Lightning

The Lightning are still really sad, unfortunately. Vincent Lecavalier is going to be a superstar someday soon, but I almost feel like playing on this team is dragging him down. That could be why he's holding out this offseason. Newcomer Vaclav Prospal should add a little more scoring touch up front and Fredrik Modin is yet another star-to-be stuck in Tampa. Stan Neckar and Pavel Kubina are strong on defense and the addition of Nikolai Khabibulin will cut down on goals allowed, but this team is still the Lightning.

Atlanta Thrashers

Ilya Kovalchuk and Dany Heatley should be playing full-time this year, providing two young stars up front to go along with Ray Ferraro and Patrik Stefan, but aside from that all the Thrash have up front is a lot of journeymen. Petr Buzek and a host of veterans lead a decent crew of bluliners and Damian Rhodes is still a legit goalie. If the youngsters come along, the team will finish far better than last in the East.

Florida Panthers

My, how the mighty have fallen. The Panthers used to be one of the top teams in the East and now they are reduced to a couple of guys named Bure.

Big games loom for UMass

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

In sports, there is a popular allusion that in order to have a successful season a team has to win the so-called big games. That is exactly the fact that faces the Massachusetts volleyball team this weekend.

After coming off a rough second weekend of its Atlantic 10 schedule in which it won only one game in two matches, the Massachusetts volleyball team will look to rebound this weekend as it hosts Fordham and George Washington in a pair of vital games.

Both teams should prove a challenge for the Minutewomen (7-5 overall, 1-3 A-10) who are in desperate need of victories if they are going to make an appearance in this year's A-10 Tournament – a tourney that they will play host to. Last season, the Maroon and White posted a 10-6 conference record and finished in a tie for fourth place, but due to tiebreakers found itself on the outside looking in for the playoffs.

UMass is coming off a weekend during which it played host to two of the conference's best teams in Xavier and Dayton. The result was a pair of losses in which the Minutewomen only won one game and posted a hitting percentage of .187, as compared to .274 for their two opponents.

The Minutewoman offense features three players who are averaging in excess of three kills per game in seniors Lymarie Llovet and Lauren Vander Veen and sophomore Nitia Small. Co-captains Llovet and Jantcen DeMarte have been the strongholds on defense this season, as they have averaged 3.44 and 2.85 digs per game respectively.

Two weeks ago the Maroon and White traveled to Philly, where it took one out of two from conference foes LaSalle and Temple. The Minutewomen swept the Explorers in their Friday match, but then were upended by the perennially powerful Owls in three games.

The Rams (5-7 overall, 0-4 A-10) are the first bump in the road for the Minutewomen as they stampede into Amherst on Friday night. In order to Cage its opposing animals, the Maroon and White will have to corral sophomores Roxanne Hill and Mele Misi, who have posted 3.54 and 2.98 kills per game for the year. They are also the leaders on defense, as they have combined for an average of 5.15 digs and 1.22 blocks per game.

Fordham is on a six game losing streak, including a loss Tuesday at home against A-10 rival Rhode Island. In the hard-fought five game battle, Fordham actually out-hit its counterpart .208 to .203, but the home squad only hit .042 in the final game as compared to Rhody's impressive .476 hitting percentage. Last year, the Minutewomen won both matches against Fordham, both times in three games. The Maroon and White outscored the Rams in those matches by a total score of 90-57.

As for George Washington, they will invade the UMass campus for a Saturday rendezvous with the Minutewomen. The Colonials (4-7, 3-1 A-10) are led by Ruth Lazzari and Laura Harrison, who have put up 3.05 and 2.64 kills per game this season respectively. Those two, along with Sarah Hokom, anchor the defense as the three have combined for 8.82 digs per game in the 11 matches this season.

The Colonials' last effort was an unimpressive 3-0 loss to Temple. In the contest, GW posted just as many kills as it made errors and mustered only 63 points for the game. On the other side, the Owls hit at a .300 clip, simply overpowering the Colonial defense.

Last season George Washington completely dominated the Maroon and White, winning six games to UMass' zero. Twice the Colonials won games by a 15-2 score. In both games, departed senior Rebecca Hasson led the team in kills with 21 in the six games.

Game time for both matches is 7:00 p.m. at Curry Hicks Cage.

Water polo eyes CWPAs

GERALD JING/COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts water polo invades Providence this weekend.

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend No. 12 ranked Massachusetts Water Polo heads into a crucial trio of games in the College Water Polo Association tournament at Brown University. The Minutemen will square off against Iona and Queens on Saturday, and host Brown on Sunday.

The Minutemen (14-2) are coming off a terrific weekend series in which they defeated George Washington, Bucknell, and Navy, while losing a hard-fought battle to league rival Princeton. However, their play was enough to bump Princeton from its previous No. 12 ranking. Also, senior goalie J.P. VanderWall was named UMass/WHMP Athlete of the Week yesterday.

In this past weekend's action, VanderWall had 38 saves in 17 quarters, including 10 against Princeton and an impressive 14 against Navy. With an astounding 4.24 goals per game average, and a .700 save percentage, VanderWall leads the Maroon and White into this weekend's important matches.

The key opponent this weekend will probably be Queens College. Queens is also coming off a successful weekend at the North/South Invitational Tournament in New Jersey, where it went 4-0 against Johns Hopkins, Princeton, George Washington and Navy. Freshman keeper Vedran Sokac and freshman 2-meter defenseman Michel Vieira, who netted 4 goals in the Johns Hopkins game, lead the Knights.

The Knights are, however, coming off a hard fought win against Navy. Vieira also won CWPA Player of the Week honors yesterday.

Iona is also a team that the Minutemen are anxiously preparing for. The Gaels split their games at the North/South Invitational, losing 9-5 to Princeton and 9-8 to Bucknell. The victories came over Johns Hopkins (14-7) and George Washington. Sophomore Chris Prackota, who earned the CWPA Player of the Week award early in September, leads Iona.

The Brown Bears will be looking for revenge on Sunday, when they square off with the Minutemen for the second time in three weeks. In their September 26 meeting, UMass rolled over the Bears 20-7 on Hat Tricks from juniors Justin Houck and Andre Nyce, freshman Adam Zobler and senior Mike Foley. Look for this to be a tough contest against the unranked Bears.

UMass is riding high off the weekend's wins and will be looking for continued excellence from VanderWall, as well as some points from Foley, and seniors Greg Traser and Adam Moore. Massachusetts faces off against Iona and Queens on Saturday at 11:30 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. respectively and finishes up with Brown on Sunday at 11:30 a.m.

Fall slate unkind to Minutewomen

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

There's nothing wrong with de-emphasizing the autumn term, Massachusetts' women's tennis coach Judy Dixon knows that.

"Each year we try more and more to downplay the fall season," said Dixon yesterday, after her Minutewomen dropped a 6-1 match to Connecticut at the Upper Boyden Courts. "I'm just glad we only have two matches left."

Things aren't going too well in Maroon and White tennis nation.

Early this week, the team found out that senior Lindsey Gilkoly, who recorded a 17-9 singles record and 19-10 doubles mark last season, may be out for the rest of the year. Dixon said she will find out tomorrow whether the injury is either a torn meniscus or anterior cruciate ligament.

To make matters worse, the NCAA has not cleared freshman Sasha Edelstein for play this season, due to confusion in international transfer regulations. Dixon said a second appeal has been filed on behalf of the Haifa, Israel native.

"We're in trouble," said Dixon, referring to the fact that she now has only six active players on the roster. "We're really beaten up."

And the troubles showed yesterday.

Freshman Stephanie Price won her singles match at the No. 1 slot for UMass, but UConn took the remaining four and one of two doubles matches to snatch the 6-1 victory.

"This was a surprise," said senior Helena Horak, minutes after she and sophomore Susan Hvams won the Minutewomen's only doubles point, 8-1.

Last year, UMass swept the singles matches in Storrs, C.T. for the 6-0 romp of the Huskies. But this season, the UConn women's tennis program was granted scholarship money for the first time in school history, and greatly improved its roster quality.

The Huskie's recent improvements, set with the Minutewomen's fresh wounds, told the story in the lopsided outcome.

"UConn is a growing program," Dixon said. "Plus we had the bull's eye on our backs because we're the (Atlantic 10) conference champions."

Dixon also mentioned, that in light of last year's contest, her players might have gone into the matches in a dismissive fashion.

"We had a hard time concentrating out there," she said. "We weren't mentally prepared."

The plan now in the UMass camp is centered on getting out of the fall season healthy.

UMass will host crosstown rival Amherst College today at 3:30 on the Upper Boyden Courts. The game is a makeup from its Sept. 18 cancellation.

Amherst has reached the Division III Final Four in four consecutive seasons. The Lady Jeffs are 2-0 in dual matches so far this fall.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – An opportunity arises late in the day which you may not be prepared for, but which you cannot afford to pass up, no matter what the risks. So go out with that girl in your art class, I mean when else are you going to get asked out again.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Trust your charm and sex appeal to open one or two important doors for you today. Like that hot guy's door down the hall.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – What others are not providing you with at this time you can certainly provide for yourself today – and then some. Ponder this: gophers don't have spots. Or do they?
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may attract a great deal of attention today for two highly contrasting decisions. By day's end, alliances and loyalties will seem clear. Survivor: Africa starts next week. Get your rice ready!
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may be dissatisfied with the progress you are making at this time, but by day's end you'll hit upon a new way to pick up the pace. Instead of 12oz cups of coffee, take shots of caffeine extract...it's like hard alcohol instead of beer.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You're in the midst of a long-term healing process, and whether you know it or not, you are far more vulnerable. Avoid any kind of self-destruction. Mike Delano could in fact beat a cheetah, but only if punched it in the head enough times.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Be ready to step in when someone you trust is unable to fulfill his or her responsibilities to the letter. You can save the day! Just like Superman, but make sure you have your kryptonite.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – The personal stakes may be unusually high today and are likely to increase as the hours tick past. It's time to make a commitment! Sometimes Cleo has her days when she can't keep it real.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – This is a good day to make plans by which you can better yourself in some fashion. You may want to take a friend's advice. Listen to them when they tell you you can't wear your pajamas to class.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Your attraction to those who share your interests will increase today, but you must control yourself and avoid going too far astray. Try not to fall in the campus pond when you're drunk.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Today will be an interesting day for you, as you overcome some serious obstacles. Oh, wait, no that's not you. You're going to spend yet another day in bed watching Jenny Jones and eating Cheetos. Get a job.

Deja-vu all over again

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

WALTHAM – If the third time's a charm, what's the fourth time? A lucky charm?

If so, it's time to break out the green clovers and blue diamonds.

The Massachusetts field hockey team downed Boston University last night at Bentley College by a score of 2-1, the fourth-straight contest between the two with that outcome. It was also the second consecutive regular-season meeting between the two that resulted in overtime, though the Minutewomen needed only 48 seconds of the extra set to triumph on an Anke Bruemmer penalty stroke.

The Minutewomen (3-5) held a 1-0 lead for most of the contest, only to have the Terriers (4-5) notch the equalizer with just over two minutes to go in regulation. Bruemmer's stroke in OT was set up by teammate Ashley Gilbert, who slashed to goal and juked Terrier keeper Sue Harrington before having her stick hooked from behind by BU's Meredith Long.

"The net was wide-open in front of me, so I would've scored anyway," Gilbert said. "I was so confident with Anke coming in to take the stroke that I assumed the game was over."

"We just ran out of miracles," said Terrier head coach Sally Starr, who watched her team play its third OT period in as many games. "You can't constantly put yourself in situations where you have to come back or win in overtime."

The Minutewomen grabbed early momentum in the contest by opening scoring at the 29:47 mark. Sophomore Beth Percival dribbled in from the right corner and launched a centering pass into a cluster of players, from which teammate Erika Whiston was able to get free and redirect the ball. Harrington, somewhat screened on the play, had no chance for a save.

Lindsay Abbot and the UMass front line stayed one step ahead of B.U.

The goal was Whiston's fourth of the year, strengthening her position as the team's second-leading scorer.

The Minutewomen kept the heat on for the next 10 minutes, as Gilbert, Whiston and junior Stacey Blue provided deft penetration and set up a number of great looks for the Minutewomen. Harrington's aggression kept UMass from capitalizing, but Starr's frustration on the sideline was evident.

"Lack of intensity early has been our Achilles Heel all season," said the 21st-year coach. "And the biggest thing we had talked about was coming out and playing hard in the first 15 minutes. We just didn't do it."

The Terriers got back on track midway through the first half, as sharper transition passing and more confident dribbling led to five BU penalty corners in a 6:19 span. But even in the face of such pressure, UMass keeper Ashley Egland bent but didn't break and escaped the frame unscathed.

"We practice defensive corners every single day, so we knew that we could handle it," said UMass coach Patty Shea. "You just think about defending each corner – you can't dwell on what caused it or what you did wrong. That's ancient history."

The Terriers kept the pressure on in the second half, as two more penalty corners within the first 1:13 led to one of BU's best scoring chances of the game. Long gathered up a blocked corner shot and went hard at Egland, but Bruemmer came from behind and reached over the BU freshman's shoulder to poke the ball away.

The Maroon and White's aggression cost it somewhat at the 29:52 mark, when freshman Adrianne Monaco got tangled up with Terrier Kara Rossi and ended up being slapped with a green card for roughness.

"He called me for an elbow, but it wasn't blatant or anything," Monaco said. "They don't call it every time, so you kind of take your chances. You don't want to be less aggressive because you got carded."

The Terrier's may have been more inspired by the play than anyone, as they again put the pressure on the UMass defense with three straight penalty corners. The third left Egland isolated against Long yet again, but the BU midfielder's shot was denied this time by a flamboyant kick save from the sophomore goalie.

"Ashley played great, and the difference was her aggression," said Shea, herself a former keeper. "Most of the time in goal, it's better to be proactive than it is to be reactive. And that starts a nice domino effect with your whole defense."

As good as the UMass defense was, the dominoes finally fell with 2:12 left in regulation. The Terriers earned their twelfth penalty corner but botched the stop, leading to a loose ball just to the right of the circle that was subsequently knocked back across the front of the UMass goal. BU's Felicia Cappabianca was in perfect position for the tip, and the game was locked at 1-1.

The Minutewomen had a prime chance to win on their sixth and final penalty corner with nine seconds left, but Harrington made a sprawling save to stop Bruemmer's delayed shot.

Field hockey doubles up BU as Terriers still looking for a home

WALTHAM – Never, ever ask a homeless person about his or her lack of accommodations. It can get downright ugly.

Such was the case following last night's field hockey game at Bentley College, where Boston University had borrowed the Falcons' home field to host visiting Massachusetts. Following the Terriers' 2-1 defeat at the hands of the Minutewomen, BU coach Sally Starr was asked about her team's lack of a true home turf.

"That's a taboo subject," snapped Starr. "We don't talk about it, and we've asked the players, parents and fans not to talk about it either."

Such hostility is probably warranted, considering the situation that has unfolded with BU's Nickerson Field. Last Spring, the University accepted a renovation proposal from professional soccer's Boston Breakers.

ADAM WHITE

In exchange for field access, the WUSA program agreed to foot the bill for a wealth of renovations to Nickerson – a new scoreboard, new chairback seats and even a replacement playing surface. It was that surface that doomed the BU field hockey team.

"The Astroturf was replaced with Astrograss, or turf grass," said BU assistant sports information director Steve Lemon. "Now our soccer and lacrosse teams can bring in top-level competition that normally wouldn't have played there."

Unfortunately, Astrograss and field hockey simply don't mix. The artificial grass is longer and thicker than natural grass, making for a surface that is entirely too slow for a game that relies on rocket passing and breakaways. As a result, the Terriers have been forced to play every game of their 2001 season – and even practice – on the road.

"That's got to be extremely difficult," said UMass coach Patty Shea. "Every day, you've got to get in the vans and lug your equipment to another field. They're lucky that they have the neighboring turf to play on, but it's still very hard."

Worse yet, there is no relief in sight for the road-weary Terriers. Lemon said that no immediate plans for a new field have been finalized, and even the ideas that have been proposed – such as building a new field atop a proposed garage across the street from Nickerson – are far from finalization.

"It could be years before this team plays another home game," Lemon said.

Which leaves the Terriers with the unenviable task of winning on the road – indefinitely. That would explain their 21st-year coach's attitude of not dwelling in the past but instead focusing on victory instead of venue.

"There's no question we miss our field; 'Nick at night' was awesome," Starr said. "But fields don't win games. Players do."

UMass status is questionable

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Sometimes when it is hard to smile, all you can do is laugh.

Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple will attest to that. Set in the middle of a bye week, he realizes his Minutemen won't have the chance Saturday, to salvage some hope for what looks to many as an already lost season.

UMass is 0-4 and has been outscored 151-43 in that stretch.

"It eats at me," said Whipple yesterday. "But you can't let the kids see that."

In fact, the entire Minuteman panel is holding true to that approach.

"They're frustrated some, nobody expected to be 0-4," said Whipple, referring to UMass' worst start since 1957. "But there is no finger pointing. Last year we were winning and they were pointing fingers."

As difficult as it might be, UMass camp will continue to run on a positive note.

"We have seven games left, who says we're not going to win all of them," said Whipple, asking for a mini-miracle.

It's going to be tough. Junior Anton McKenzie will likely sit out the Minutemen's contest next Saturday when they host New Hampshire at 1 p.m. in McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The linebacker/defensive back severely injured his hamstring in the first half of last Saturday's 36-6 loss at Hofstra and could be out longer than just a single game. In three games and one quarter of play, McKenzie totaled two interceptions and 26 total tackles.

Senior Omari Howard is also a doubtful for next week. The tailback, who experienced turf-toe after the Marshall game, hurt his shoulder in last week's match with The Pride.

Also questionable for the UNH encounter are offensive linemen Matt Coffe and Maikel Miret, the junior center.

"It's tough to practice when you can't hit," Whipple said. "We're just doing speed work outs now and we have to go without our line in practice.

"But we really need to get our line back."

Sophomore linebacker/long snapper Jeremy Cain and senior fullback Pete Carriello are also the UMass disabled list. Their status for next Saturday is uncertain.

"The coaching staff has worked longer hours than it ever has," said Whipple, describing his roster situation for the upcoming weeks. "But it's hard to prepare when you don't know who can play."

Three contributors Whipple can definitely count on come in the form of freshman.

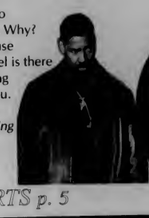
Wide receiver Jason Peebler has caught five passes for 62 yards and is showing signs of confidence on the flanks.

"If he doesn't start, then he's going to see a lot of playing time," said Whipple, describing the former high school running back. "He's not scared, he catches the ball, and he just makes plays."

Cabral Edley should also see some extended action at tailback. He has rushed 12 times this season for 50 yards.

"Edley is going to be a good player," said Whipple of the lanky, high-stepping runner. "But he needs to grow up some more."

The final youngster to shed some light on Amherst goes by the name of L.A. Love. He reads each play with great skill, and has labored for each of his 12 tackles.



"L.A. Love is really playing well," Whipple said. "He's going to be the next great UMass linebacker."

Author Agustin Lao-Montes spoke at Food For Thought Books in Amherst.

Book store hosts lecture

By Elizabeth Pariseau
Collegian Staff

Food For Thought Books opened its doors last night for a discussion about Latino/Latina culture and its effects on wider American culture.

The audience mingled for about thirty minutes before the discussion began, around a small table of refreshments.

Those gathered represented a diverse body of different cultures, educational backgrounds, and ages. Professors and scholars from all Five Colleges conversed about fields like sociology, philosophy, Hispanic studies, Asian studies and psychology before the talk began.

Families and groups of friends shared gossip and talked about Agustin Lao-Montes' book, Mambo Montage: The Latinization of New York, which was to be the focus of the talk.

The area of the store used for the talk typically contains the large shelves full of textbooks familiar to students during the textbook rush. Last night, the area that had played host to long lines for the registers earlier in the semester took on a more relaxed feel.

Joan Barberich, Events Coordinator for Food for Thought, conducted a drawing for a free copy of the book, and introduced Lao-Montes. In her introductory speech, she cited a quote used in the introduction of the book, saying, "New York has 11 thousand histories."

"That fact is particularly poignant given how suddenly reduced that number has become," since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, Barberich said.

Lao-Montes and his associate, speaker Jose "Pepe" Itzigsohn, also commented on the effects the World Trade Center attacks have had on their field of study in New York. Lao-Montes pointed out that more than 800 Puerto Ricans had perished in the disaster, and more than 1000 of Latin-American descent had lost their lives in all.

"Puerto Rico is one of my homes," said Lao-Montes, expressing grief for the victims. "But many of us have many homes."

The talk then turned to New York, America, and cultural changes in the last few decades.

Lao-Montes read from the introduction he wrote to Mambo Montage, often taking time out to more thoroughly discuss certain points with the audience.

He said he wanted to encourage dialogue among attendees.

One topic of discussion was the idea of the mambo, which Lao-Montes pointed out was "not just a sexy title" for the book. Mambo, a traditional Latin dance, involves an interplay of steps between the dancers, "a point-counterpoint rhythm" as Lao-Montes described. He said that the book, an anthology of articles rather than a single narrative, demonstrated this, and that Latino/Latina identity is constructed in a similar way.

He said that New York was important as a "crossroads" of identities, Latin and otherwise, and that it was also "a symbol not just of American, but of world power."

Latinization of the city, he said, has taken several forms in recent years, some more pervasive than others. For example, a Latin explosion of popular music has been a prominent feature of this trend. Also, he said New York may soon be in a position to elect its first Latino mayor.

Itzigsohn pointed out that a number of state legislators and city councilors in Providence, R.I., where he now resides, are of Latino/Latina heritage.

"Latinization is not just occurring in New York," Itzigsohn said.

On the other hand, the spreading of Latino/Latina culture in the city and across the country has had its downsides, Lao-Montes said. The book, he pointed out "is not just a celebration" of Latin-/Latina culture.

"It is also a critique," Lao-Montes said.

This was especially important to him, because he said he was writing from both a sociological and a personal position about cultural identity.

Among the criticisms that Lao-Montes had to offer was that, while Latin identity is gaining recognition, often those in the "dominant culture" had a tendency to "exoticize" it. Lao-Montes pointed to the establishment of a number of expensive, flamboyant eateries on the East Side that served "a gourmet version of Latino food," as a sign of this trend.

Also, he said, while certain parts of Latin identity, such as dance, music, and food have become popular, other parts have lagged behind. He spoke about the struggle of working class Latino/Latina students "fighting to get an education and access to relevant course materials," especially at the City University of New York.

The lag in acceptance applies especially to language, according to Lao-Montes, which he said he felt was "the most marginalized" aspect of Latino/Latina identity. Interestingly, though the discussion centered around latinidad ta Spanish term for Latin identity, which roughly translates into "latinicity"), the entire discussion, as well as the book being discussed, was conducted in English.

A mix of languages was evident, however, in the text that Lao-Montes read. The selection concluded with the statement, "Aqui to be called Negrito is to be called love."

Overall, Lao-Montes applauded what he said he saw as a move toward multi-cultural history and identity in the United States.

Itzigsohn then took the stage for a more informal talk about his contribution to the book, an article on Dominican identities. As he improvised, he joked, "I guess my role in [tonight's] mambo is to jam."

He talked about his field research as part of the project, in which he interviewed those of Latin heritage in the city, focusing on those with ancestry in the Dominican Republic. He pointed out the political complexity among recent immigrants from the wide array of nations that make up the Latin world.

He said that community building in such a diverse group is difficult, though to the "dominant culture" Latinos and Latinas appear to be a unified group. He cited public health and social services created to serve a Latino/Latina community that may or may not truly exist as a part of the misleading appearance of cultural unity.

The cultural influences on Latino/Latina identity are threefold, Itzingsohn said, and may be comprised of different amounts of locational identity according to where one lives, national identity, according to where one was born, and what he called "pan-ethnicity," according to how one works within a larger international culture.

Goals set by SGA

By Kristin Shrewsbury

Newly elected committee chairs of the Student Government Association's Senate met last night to discuss the future involvement of the Senate within the student body.

Chairs brought forth their hopes as well as goals for the upcoming year, expressing ideas dealing with fundraising, diversity on campus, parking services and auxiliary services.

Working with the administration was also expressed as a top priority for the SGA and all its members. Speaker of the Senate Aaron Saunders spoke on the necessity of having communication with administrators within each committee in order to have motions become a reality at the University of Massachusetts.

"We need to set up meetings with all the vice chancellors or top individuals within each area of these committees that you're dealing with," Saunders said. "We play the role of the watchdog on a lot of issues, but by meeting on a weekly basis we can keep each other informed on what is going on within each committee."

As committee chairs expressed their goals for the future, they all shared one common theme; the need for proactive committees.

He talked about his field research as part of the project, in which he interviewed those of Latin heritage in the city, focusing on those with ancestry in the Dominican Republic. He pointed out the political complexity among recent immigrants from the wide array of nations that make up the Latin world.

He said that community building in such a diverse group is difficult, though to the "dominant culture" Latinos and Latinas appear to be a unified group. He cited public health and social services created to serve a Latino/Latina community that may or may not truly exist as a part of the misleading appearance of cultural unity.

"Public Policy and Relations hasn't always been a proactive committee and we are looking to come up with ideas to promote the SGA and get information directly out to students," Chair Michael Whitehouse said.

Other issues addressed were that involving the responsibilities of the committees as well as the Senate as a whole to follow up on motions passed. Members stressed the need at the Oct. 3 Senate meeting to be informed as to what happens when a motion is passed and placed in the university's hands. This was again addressed at last night's chair meeting.

"We aren't looking to pump out a bunch of motions, but follow up on what we do as a committee," Diversity Committee Chair Scott Turnberg said. "We're going to be looking into the Commonwealth College...and specifically at hate crimes as a result of Sept. 11."

Chair of University Policy Commitee Courtney Horrocks agreed by expressing the need to follow up with motions with the administration as well. She continued by explaining that her committee will be assigning task forces in which to focus on specific issues.

The idea of task forces within each committee is a newly implemented idea by Saunders, Associate Speaker Bill Powers and members of the Executive Cabinet. Thus, each committee will have individuals focused on specific issues, in which each will be responsible for following up on.

"Last year people had things they wanted to due, but work wasn't getting done," Horrocks said. "This year we're going to make sure that things are followed through and that motions get through the administration so we can make policies. We want to break down all the bureaucracies and red tape and makes things better."

Chair of the Finance Committee Steve Hoeschele explained his precise plan for the year.

Bush unveils new policy

By Melissa Hammel

Efforts to rebuild the United States after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks are coming at a slow pace and at a high cost.

A statement from the City Controller's Office in New York yesterday accessed the damages to the World Trade Center estimating that it might cost the city nearly $105 billion over two years. The total cost includes an estimated $45 to $65 billion on things like effects upon the economy due to the attacks, and approximately $45 billion to repair building and to properly deal with the loss of life. The city has so far raised one billion dollars in efforts to rebuild the city, and the report states that only $37 billion will be covered in insurance costs.

In an attempt to make rebuilding easier for those who have been left jobless, President George W. Bush made a statement yesterday trying to give the American people financial hope.

"I strongly believe we need to make sure that the consumer confidence stays high by giving people more of their own money back," Bush said. "We need to counter the shockwave of the evildoer by having individual rate cuts accelerated and by thinking about tax rebates."

He explained that in order to help those who were left out of work following the attacks, there would be unemployment benefits available for up to 18 months.

"I propose extending the unemployment benefits by 13 weeks in states that have been hit hard by job losses related to the Sept. 11 attack," Bush said. "The emergency extension will be paid entirely by federal dollars and should remain in place for 18 months."

In addition, he proposed that the government help fund health care needs for people deeply affected and out of work because of the attacks, providing for a number of individuals' different requirements.

"I believe that the best way to help people meet health care needs, or on-the-job training needs, or income support is to fund the National Emergency Grant System by an additional three billion," President Bush said. "This will be federal money that will go to states so they can distribute monies directly to people whose lives have been affected."

In his public statement Bush also addressed the need for government funded aid, tax cuts and additional spending to allow the reconstruction of New York City.

"It is time for our government to continue to work together – to say, we hear the cries of those who have been laid off; we worry about the shock waves throughout our economy, and instead of talking we are going to do something about it," Bush said. "There are $40 billion of tax rebates that have been disbursed over the last months. That should help our economy. The Congress came together and passed $15 billion in emergency help for airlines, and $40 billion in supplemental spending that will help New York rebuild herself."

In more efforts to recover from the terrorist attacks, the Metropolitan Washington Airport Authority reopened Reagan National Airport. Nearby Washington Dulles International Airport has been open, although its security has been beefed up.

"The airlines are operating approximately 85 percent of their regular schedules," the MWAA said. "Plan to arrive four hours in advance of your flight to check in and complete security procedures."

Faculty Senate upset over athletic spending gap

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The faculty of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst is asking for the immediate correction in the amount of money spent, per student, on academics.

A recent study by the Office of Financial and Cost Analysis found that UMass spent $351 more than six peer schools on athletic support. The same study found that the university spent $213 less than average on academic support.

The six peer schools surveyed were the Rutgers system, the University of California-Santa Barbara, the University of Colorado, the University of Maryland-College Park and the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

The discrepancy in the athletic money can be accounted for, associate Vice Chancellor of Finance and Budget Joyce Hatch explained to the Faculty Senate yesterday afternoon.

"I need to add that these institutions were selected to be academic peers, not athletic peers," Hatch said. "This is an average."

The average amount of money spent per student on academic support at the peer institutions is $2,008, UMass, the report says, spends $1,286.

"We're not above average, but we're not far below either," Hatch said. "We are pretty much in the middle, slightly less."

The motion before the Faculty Senate, which called for "the Faculty Senate to urge the university and campus administration to commence immediately to correct the imbalances" in funding, concerned Hatch.

"There's been a lot of talk of immediate decisions and I'm not sure," Hatch said. "That's not what this [report] was meant to do."

The assembled Senators had many questions regarding the report, and many of them centered on the above average spending on the athletic program.

Senator Brian O'Connor, the Faculty Senate's delegate to the Board of Trustees, wondered about the numbers and the administration's "spin."

"It seems as though over the past ten years I can think of half a dozen academic programs that have been terminated, and I can think of at least one athletic program, hockey, that was reinstated at the time," O'Connor said.

"It's unacceptable that we're decreasing academics and increasing athletics," he continued.

Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams tried to allay fears that the university cared more about its sports teams than it did about its scholars. Williams explained to the faculty that the list of peers, since they were academic peers, could not compare with UMass's own teams on a fiscal level.

"Athletics, as we all know, is one program in an institution that doesn't track with the academic programs. What we need is the same set of peers that we have in athletics," Williams said. "The dollars that are going into athletics are very different from the dollars that our academic peers are putting into their athletics."

Many senators disagreed. Many rose and spoke against athletic funding.

"If we look at the picture in New England, the colleges and universities, public or private, none of them, maybe Boston College, can compete at the level that we are trying to compete at," Senator Juan Zamora said. "We should not try and become competitive. We should reduce our spending because we know that we will never compare with Iowa, Ohio, or California."

Rules Committee Chair Roland Chilton thought that the educational aspect of the university was slipping away into locker rooms and arenas.

"If they are going to put athletics above educating the young people of the Commonwealth, then we are in rough shape," Chilton said. "My hope is that we'll change the tone from an academic discourse to one that says we know that academic programs have been cut, that faculty have been lost. We need to say that it's out of balance; we need to readjust it."

Senator O'Connor explained that the report's findings, which had been published in the Oct. 3 issue of The Boston Globe, were already having repercussions in the classroom.

"All of us in this room deal with parents, and we're starting to get the question that we spend more money on athletics than academics," O'Connor said.

And even if UMass compares its athletic spending with athletic peers, O'Connor is still worried.

"I think we'll still find that we're spending more. You can play with the numbers anyway you want," O'Connor said. "The figures scare me."

Draft status worries at LSU; male students in jeopardy

By Diette Courrege
The Reveille (Louisiana State U.)

(U-WIRE) BATON ROUGE, La. – If fifth-year architecture senior Robert Wagner does not register for the Selective Service, he will not be able to schedule classes for the Spring semester or receive an official University transcript from Louisiana State University.

Wagner is one of fewer than 400 students affected by the implementation of a two-year-old Louisiana amendment.

According to the 1999 amendment to act R.S. 17:3151(A), "...no person who is required to register for the federal draft under the federal Military Selective Service Act shall be eligible to enroll in any postsecondary educational institution which receives any state or federal funds until such person has registered for such draft.

Robert Doolos, University Registrar said this means no eligible male can enroll at any state community college or university until he has registered with the draft.

"It's coincidental that we are starting to enforce this law and that Sept. 11 occurred," Doolos said.

The United States Selective Service System requires virtually all male U.S. citizens and most male non-citizens living in the United States between the ages of 18 and 26 to register for the draft.

Young men serving in the military on full-time active duty also do not have to register. Women do not have to register because the drafts operate mainly to provide ground combat positions.

Military policy originally did not permit women to serve in front line ground combat positions. Congress would have to change this law to draft women.

When a male turns 18, federal law requires him to register with the Selective Service. In a national emergency, the government would use the list to call men to military service. Until now, there has been no state mandate to enforce this federal law.

"If it comes down to [not being able to register for my classes], then I'll register," Wagner said. "It should be a federal thing; it's not the state's business."

Before the amendment, students attested they were registered with the Selective Service by signing a section on the University admission application. However, the amendment now requires the University to verify students have registered with the draft.

Doolos said the University did not begin enforcing the new amendment in 1999 because the University management board had to disseminate the rules and regulations of enforcement.

"Once the [management board] did that, we started working on coming into compliance with the law," he said. "We waited on the board to tell us what we needed to do."

The Registrar's Office began working in April 2000 to ensure the University's male students were in compliance with the law.

"After the 14th day of class, or Census Day in Spring 2000, we selected students at the University that were male," Doolos said. "We then did some edits to that group and excluded those under 18 years of age and those older than 26."

The office then compared the remaining group of 14,749 male students with Student Aid files.

"We are fortunate in a sense because in order to be awarded federal financial aid, these young men had to register with the draft," he said.

After checking against the Student Aid records, the University had more than 5,000 students left to affirm their registration. Doolos said he worked with the Selective Service during the summer to receive confirmation on the remaining students.

"They sent us a response last week," he said. "I was pleasantly surprised to find out that we have fewer than 400 male students that need to register. For us to have fewer than 400 is amazing."

Doolos said the University will send letters to unregistered male students this week telling them to register for the draft.

"Until students register, they will not be able to schedule courses for the Spring semester, nor will they be able to receive an official transcript," Doolos said. "We thought this was a better option than not allowing them to register for this Fall semester."

Doolos said students need to tell the University after they register with the Selective Service so the University can lift the flag on their schedules.

"The Selective Service does not inform us of a student registering with them," he said.

The University checked new, eligible male students this past semester before they entered the University.

"This is not a one-time thing, though," he said. "We will have to track students who are now 17 and will turn 18 to make sure they register. Also, any new or transfer students must be checked. It's an ongoing process."

Most students agreed males should register for the draft when they turn 18, but they disagreed over who should be responsible for enforcing the law.

Post-Soviet women subject at MHC

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The role of women in Russian society, and in the post-Communist upheaval, has been the subject of much academic study. Jennifer Patico, a research associate at the Five College Women's Research Center, has decided to examine a unique aspect of this topic by exploring the consumer practices and ideologies of Russian women.

Patico, a recent recipient of a PhD in Anthropology from New York University, wrote her dissertation on the subject. Last night, at Mt. Holyoke College, she delivered, "'Cultured' Consumption and Gender in Post-Soviet Transformations", a lecture based on her dissertation research.

"I've been interested in addressing the constraints [Russian women] face as consumers," Patico said, "and in the everyday experiences of social upheaval."

Patico spent a year in Russia, interviewing female teachers at St. Petersburg public schools. She explained that school-teachers were ideal for her research.

"In Russia, the teaching profession is highly feminized," she said, "even more so than in America. It was useful to work in an area that was female-dominated."

By talking to the women, Patico was able "to gain considerable insight into their lives outside of school."

One of the focuses of Patico's research was the way that the women viewed the contrast between work and leisure time.

In the former Soviet Union, the Communist government dictated nearly all aspects of public life, and leisure time was a rarity. Workers would often socialize as a means of "fighting the system."

Today, most Russians still have little time for relaxation. But for a wealthy elite, often referred to as the "New Russians," sitting at home is a sign of privilege.

"Leisure time is no longer a state-regulated resource," Patico said, "but a flaunted asset that sets people apart from others."

Today, many wealthy Russian women spend their time shopping and taking aerobics classes. Yet, unlike Americans, who often look at such lifestyles with envy, many Russians, such as the St. Petersburg schoolteachers, look down on idleness.

"The teachers complain of how much harder-working they've become," says Patico, "but they were practically unanimous in not wanting to be lazy." She quoted one woman as saying, "To stay in shape one must have contact with people and an intellectual life. To stay at home – no."

"They see work and meaningful social contact as necessary to be a full person," Patico said.

Russian women have traditionally placed value on the role of "khoziaiika," a word that refers to a housewife, or hostess. The "New Russian" women, with their expensive hobbies, are seen as poor khoziaiiki. Yet, ironically, working-class women often feel that they are too busy to fully take on the role of khoziaiika themselves.

Patico identified what she considers a crucial paradox – that circumstances prevent "the right kind of woman" from playing "the right kind of role" in contemporary Russia.

When Patico had concluded speaking, Dr. Mathilde Schmitt, a fellow research associate, critiqued her lecture.

Schmitt stated that she found it interesting that Russians were focused on the khoziaiika role.

"People seem to be fixed on it," she said. "Maybe it's an expression of some kind of safety for women who experience quite a lot of insecurity. Does insecurity produce a demand for simplicity?

"It seems as if 'khoziaiika' is ingrained as the right kind of role, but [the teachers] seem to reject it for themselves," she said.

One of the lecture's attendees asked Patico about the teachers' view of the Western world, and the apparent contradiction that they looked down on western extravagance yet often embraced American magazines like Cosmopolitan.

Patico responded by saying that working Russian women don't necessarily disapprove of the image of western women.

"They would talk about how they wanted for themselves a sort of middle class Western life," she said. "'New Russian' women weren't exactly 'western'. In their minds, because they were seen as some sort of warped version of capitalism."

The audience's reaction to Patico's lecture was overwhelmingly positive.

"I think [examining attitudes toward work and leisure time] is an extremely important way to define cross-cultural issues," said Amrita Basu, director of the Research Center, and a professor of Political Science and Women's and Gender Studies at Amherst College. "Tension between those two spheres is very important in Russia, especially in post-Soviet Russia, where leisure time plays a very important role. In the past, worked played the important role."

accountability to the Finance Committee especially when dealing with the Area Governments," Hoeschele said. "Area Governments are a really good asset to the SGA and they face up to the rest of the SGA."

Hoeschele continued by explaining that the Finance Committee is looking to do a variety of fundraisers for the SGA with the help of Area Governments.

"If we utilize the Area Governments, they will not only benefit, but it will give them a chance to put more money in their pockets as well as the rest of the SGA," Hoeschele said. "Fundraising is a risky business, but we're willing to take it on."

As the meeting came to a close, Saunders expressed his final thoughts on the committees and their agendas for the Senate and student body as whole.

"We have tons of great ideas, and as leaders we need to make sure that we have good motions to go through Senate," Saunders said. "But in order to do so we must demand research, demand that people talk to administrators and one another so that we can have quality motions."

Committee Chair meetings will take place prior to regularly scheduled Senate meetings.

As an example, Itzigsohn called attention to racial relations on the island of the Dominican Republic. He said that many Latinos and Latinas on the island "distanced themselves from blackness," making them somewhat biased against African Americans. But he also pointed out that many black Dominicans have been able to forge stronger communities in the more diverse social climate of New York.

No matter what complexities lie within Latin culture, Itzigsohn said, how it has influenced contemporary American culture cannot and should not be overlooked.

Penn State safety measures ruffle feathers

By Dina Ackerman
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Pennsylvania)

(U-WIRE) PHILADELPHIA – The Undergraduate Assembly and student civil rights activists debated with University of Pennsylvania's top safety official Sunday night over a hotly contested University proposal that would ask all students, faculty and staff to wear their PennCards at all times.

But despite Sunday night's discussions, the UA ultimately decided that the group needed more information before its members could agree upon a formal stance on the issue. The matter was delegated to the UA's West Philadelphia subcommittee.

The Division of Public Safety recently proposed a voluntary policy asking members of the Penn community to wear their Penn IDs to enter academic buildings. Right now, University policy requires Penn IDs to be worn from 10 p.m. until 7 a.m., while the proposed policy would be in effect 24 hours a day.

At last night's meeting, Vice President for Public Safety Maureen Rush stressed that although the proposal came shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, it was not directly linked to the strikes on New York and Washington.

Instead, she claimed, the ID policy is intended to curb on-campus theft.

"Looking at the crime statistics, you see that most thefts occur during the day," Rush said.

But shortly after her presentation, numerous UA members stressed concerns that the proposed policy would infringe upon the privacy of Penn students.

While Rush maintained that most crime on campus was committed by those unaffiliated with the University, students bounced back concerns that a tighter security policy would actually escalate students' safety concerns.

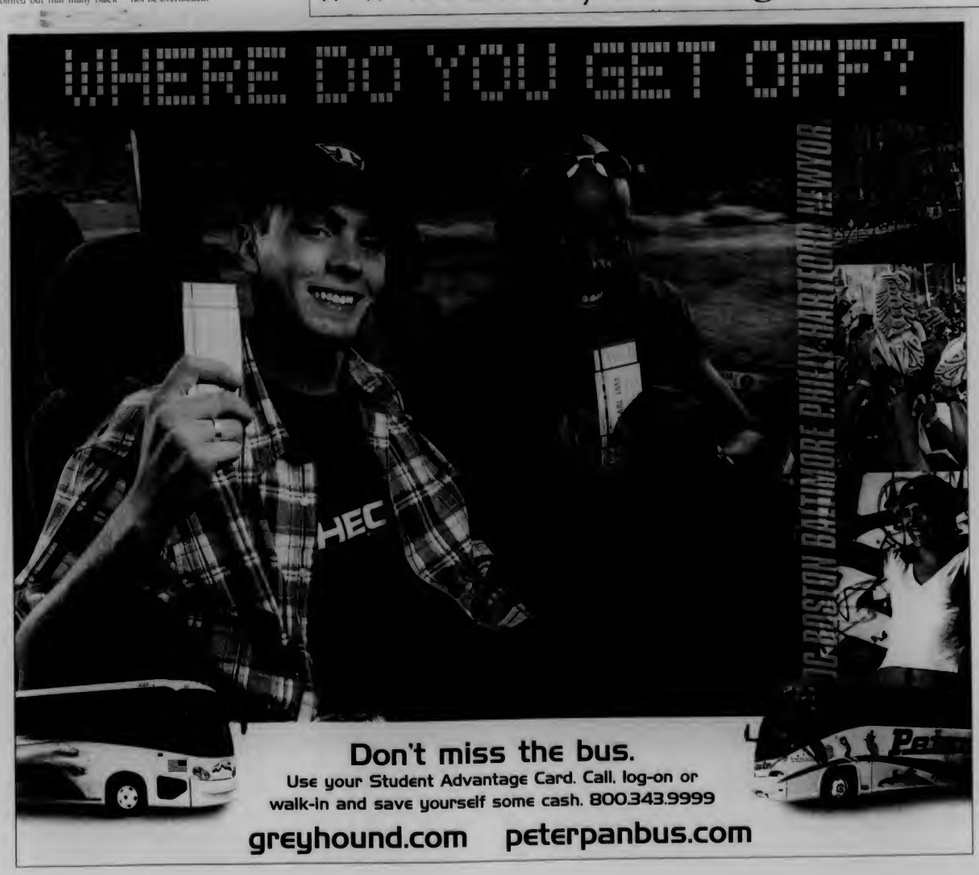
Rush, who has been at Penn for seven years, disagreed.

"I've seen the rise in police officers over the past several years," she said. "In 1995-1996, people couldn't see enough cops. The increased uniformed police presence has made people feel safer."

After Rush spoke, College sophomore Joshua Brown, president of PennACLU, demanded the UA vote against "this well-intentioned but ill-thought ID proposal."

"When considering whether our loss of freedom is worth what the University promises to deliver in the arena of safety, note that there is not much if any evidence that these universal ID systems deter illegal activity," Brown said.

Brown's comments were met with overwhelming applause, and as UA Wharton representative and junior Joanna Mesh said, "I wish [Rush] were here to hear that."



Ultimately, the UA decided that it simply didn't have enough information to vote on the issue, citing, among other things, the lack of statistics Rush brought to support the position of the Division of Public Safety. Similarly, UA members were concerned that they never saw a written copy of the proposal.

Now that the issue is with the West Philadelphia committee, a smaller group of UA members will create a statement to eventually be voted on by the entire UA.

"We want to be proactive but thoughtful in our comments," said UA Chairwoman Dana Hork, a College senior. "We're waiting a week before making a statement."

The UA will vote next week on whether to support or to stand against the University's proposal.

What is terrorism?
Our images are gray

This is not an act of terrorism.

Nor was the assault of a Greyhound bus driver on Wednesday, an incident that left six passengers dead, including the attacker.

The Russian chartered airliner that went down of the coast of the Black Sea on Thursday? Again, not terrorism, according to the United States at least. A military accident, most likely, or so say our well-informed government officials.

There's a case of pulmonary anthrax in Florida right now, a highly dangerous disease mentioned as a possible biological weapon, but we're told not to worry, that it's an isolated case.

Chances are that's right.

However, all three instances, taken in any light, are newsworthy, tragic and cases of sad misfortune. There is little doubt they would have been reported on before, but since the events of September 11, they have gained a significant weight. Any instance of aggression or violence, however small or seemingly unrelated, now opens our eyes and puts into motion a series of mental defenses. Is it terrorism? Is it related? What would have passed by unnoticed on our radar screens before is now cause for alarm, an unfortunate but natural reaction to an alarming set of events.

It's impossible to bypass these reactions because there is no buffer zone for reasoning; we're handed a newspaper or set of images on our televisions and off we go, caught by surprise and lacking a logical plan to cope.

When something of the magnitude of the 11th does finally cross us, everything in its wake echoes it. The bus attack. The plane. The rumors. Every deviation from the norm is picked up and magnified in our minds as related, as evidence – "is this what happens next?"

That's something we'll never have an answer to.

It's easy for us to try and head in the opposite direction all together and ignore what's happening – especially for those of us in college, where few things taste of the "real" real world. In a sense, school is that buffer zone we can't erect ourselves, offering a mirage of reprieve from what's going down in the daily grind. We go about our lives, unaffected, able to turn off and tune out what we don't like.

That's not an excuse, however, to remain blind to the news.

It's not an excuse to speculate.

If anything, our place here at the University if Massachusetts should be to more thoroughly investigate what we hear. Check alternative sources. Listen to opposing opinions. Educate yourself.

Take it in, but don't speculate too wildly, or draw conclusions from too little information.

Discuss what's happening with friends, family or professors. Use the University as a resource, not a hiding place. The latter is simple, the easy way out, and entirely inappropriate. This campus is home to a wide variety of opinions and backgrounds; to ignore that fact would defeat the goal that is a well-balanced education.

Awful things were happening before September 11th, and will continue to do so. We can't change that. What we can do is take each as a piece, look at it, feel it, and move on. By attaching everything to one tragic event, we'll only continue to do a disservice to ourselves.

A ribbon to remember

JAMIE LOO

Ribbons have become symbolic of hope and awareness for many different causes and are often given out during certain times of the year. Putting a ribbon onto your jacket or backpack may seem like an insignificant gesture to you, but to someone else it could mean a lot. Pink ribbons, the ribbons for breast cancer awareness, hold a special place in my heart, which I am about to share with you. Last year I was incredibly encouraged to see people continuing to wear the pins even after October, which is the awareness month.

It was June 1999, a few weeks after graduation and the prom. I was excited about the upcoming summer and going away to college in the fall. I went to the doctor's for a routine physical examination, dreading the possibility of a blood or cholesterol test because I'm afraid of needles. I didn't expect the news I received that day. While teaching me how to do a breast self-exam, my pediatrician at the time found what seemed like a small lump. She advised me to go to a breast specialist to have it checked out, saying that it might only be extra tissue, nothing serious or urgent, because it was small and at my age the chances for cancer were incredibly slim. To me, it was very serious. A million thoughts raced through my mind that day, as I thought about how hopeful and wonderful the past two months had been. At age 17, I should have been worrying about packing to go to college, not pondering cancer and the possibilities of how my life would change because of this "thing." My mother's doctor recommended a specialist who I couldn't see until September, which meant three months of waiting and wondering. I only told a few of my friends because I didn't want to scare them and I didn't want them to spend the whole summer thinking it would be my last – I didn't even want to think about that. It put things into perspective for me, thinking about how quickly time passes and how precious every moment of our lives is. I think that summer was the best in my life, despite the uncertain goodbyes I had to say to my high school friends.

I had my appointment two days before I moved into the dormitories. The specialist said it was a fibroadenoma, a benign tumor, which is rare, however commonly found in young women. I would need to have surgery for it as soon as possible and the date was set for September 24, which I would have to come home for. After my appointment I went to the Boston Public Library and for the first time I felt the need to understand what was happening to me. I looked through all sorts of books on breast cancer and only one book had the word fibroadenoma. I still remember the confusion, pain and sadness I felt when I read the four sentences about the tumor that was growing in my breast.

Those last four words are what got me. Sure, it wasn't cancer, but instead of feeling glad I felt worse. I felt hopeless because I didn't fully understand what was afflicting me and knowing that I wasn't alone. Not only was I not alone, but I was comparatively lucky compared to most women. There are women everywhere who are waiting for a cure; women who have to go through chemotherapy and masectomies just waiting for answers hoping everything will be ok. Mothers, grandmothers, aunts, sisters, nieces and friends were all silently dying leaving their families to also wonder why, and to wait for an answer.

I moved into school and tried my best to keep a positive attitude about everything that was happening. My dad picked me up from school and I had my surgery early the next morning. I still remember all of it crystal clear, but it would take too long for me to explain all the details I remember of that day. The actual surgery took about 15 minutes and was over. After the surgery the anesthesiologist told me I was incredibly inquisitive before it compared to other patients he had in the past. Apparently as I was being wheeled to the surgery room, I asked all sorts of random questions about what was going on. I asked about where the tumor would be placed and what was going to be done with it. The anesthesiologist said that it would be sent to the lab for further research and he said my response was, "What? I can't keep it?"

> "When I see pink ribbons I think about my surgery and I think about the future. The ribbons help me remember the women who have died of this disease, but they also remind me of the women who have triumphed over it and are continuing to fight."

The entire experience made me incredibly stronger as a person. I thank God for that trial, because it reminded me to seize every day and value life. Every day when I wake up, I still see the small scar, which has been a constant reminder to me of the lesson. Somedas I might develop cancer, and maybe I won't, but for now I'll keep living as longs as God wills me to do. Until studies become "conclusive," I will support research and awareness in any way that I can. When I see pink ribbons, I think about my surgery, and I think about the future. The ribbons help me remember the women who have died of this disease, but they also remind me of the women who have triumphed over it and are continuing to fight. As more research is done, we can become closer to understanding the disease and to finding a cure. I urge everyone to wear ribbons for awareness, not just for breast cancer but for all different causes. Ribbons are just a public way to show that we care about certain issues.

On another note, a few weeks after the surgery I was wandering around Dickinson on Orchard Hill looking for one of my friends. He wasn't around but I met one of his hallmates that night who was reading in the lounge. He was very handsome and when I looked into his eyes I knew he was special for some reason, but I didn't know why. I was absolutely smitten and days later he told he how much he liked me. We've been together ever since. Today, October 5th, I celebrate my second anniversary with my boyfriend Chris. Though I am 20 pounds heavier than I was freshman year, have more wrinkles, and when I'm really tired can pass off for a drug addict, he still tells me that I'm beautiful. Chris hates it when I drag him to dances but he goes with me anyways because he knows I enjoy them. He still cannot get me to try roller-blading or onto roller coasters. He throws stinky socks at me and I throw them back. I call him a computer geek and he makes up these bizarre pet names that he says once, and then never again. Chris is from Rhode Island, which I constantly tell him isn't a real state; in turn he makes fun of my hometown, Randolph. He has stayed by my side in my toughest of times, even when I had mono. While most of our friends were out quarantining me to my dorm he kept me company, battling the germs and forced me to take my medicine.

He has taught me so much about myself, life, and has made me a better person. I can't imagine what my life would be like without him, though we both know the future is always unpredictable. I have put him through a lot of stress, and there have been a lot of tears when we thought we were breaking up, but we're still together. Sometimes he worries that I don't know how much he loves me, but sometimes I worry the opposite. He worries I'll leave him for someone who'll argue with me more about politics and issues, and will take me out more often. But he's just being delusional. I just wanted to publicly say, thanks for two years, Chris. And by the way, you have nothing to worry to about.

Letters to the editor: On flags and prayer

To the editor:

September 11, 2001 was a day all Americans will never forget. It is hard to understand who or why people commit such acts of hatred toward other human beings, but in these times of tragedy we need to unite.

The students at University of the Pacific in Stockton, California, know thousands of students every fall anticipate the coming of a new school year. Students hope to make new friends, enjoy classes and maybe discover something about themselves they never knew before. Freshman especially are discovering what college is all about, and finding independence. Our biggest concerns as students are succeeding academically and enjoying ourselves in our spare time. Students never expect to find themselves in the middle of national tragedy.

At University of the Pacific we know we can't possibly comprehend what has gone on in your area. Our reality has been created through television images, and that is enough to tell us you are scared and uncertain of the future. As students we want you to know our prayers and thoughts are with you. Our deepest regards go out to the students who have lost a loved one, or still have family or friends missing, but know you are not alone in this time of sorrow and uncertainty. Our hearts reach out to you.

Remember, Americans are strong, and we will stand in support and unite together to recover from this act of terrorism. We pray that time will heal your hearts, and hopefully, someday, put your minds at ease. Here at Pacific, we hope the days of worrying about grades and making new friends will return soon. This tragedy, although horrible, will teach you something about yourself, and you will be stronger for having survived.

"Hope is not pretending your troubles don't exist. It is the trust that they will not last forever – that the hurts and sorrow will be healed and difficulties will be overcome." (Anonymous)

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the column "UMass needs to shed 'party school' image." This piece attempted to address the report of Aaron Lazare and Lazare's statement on the perceptions many hold of the University. If the community needs to shed its image of University students, Sam Wilkinson needs to shed his image of Commonwealth College students. He blatantly blames Commonwealth College students for Lazare's suggestions. Does Wilkinson have any basis for this accusation? Oh right, he "doesn't know for sure, but he can guess." How about his statement that Commonwealth College students "are not a group of individuals who go out on the weekends and enjoy themselves"? Has he talked to all Commonwealth College members or even a few of them?

Wilkinson asks that the community stop hating UMass. This is typical of someone who disdains students who are "concerned enough to volunteer." Maybe instead of whining over the results of a committee, Wilkinson could use more constructive avenues. Maybe Wilkinson could go out into the community of Amherst and contribute something, helping to change individual perceptions. I'm sure writing this column in a school newspaper, read mainly by students, will greatly change the views of the community. I hope no one from the community reads it because it only perpetuates the image of UMass students who are just expecting everything to be handed to them.

All students are suffering from the academic situation on campus, including Commonwealth College students. Instead of proclaiming that students are "the one group that can't do anything about the condition our campus is in," Wilkinson should point out that all Massachusetts residents could visit their local state representatives' office in their home district and let legislators know some of the positive aspects of the University. "Casual students with a casual attitude toward classes" are going to be the perpetual complainers because they cannot point out anything more positive at UMass than students that like to have a good time, drink beer, and the town of Amherst hates us. I doubt many legislatures would rush to pour money into such an institution.

I'm not disgusted by these students, but we can not expect the state to stand behind us if we do not promote the academic success of our campus. In my opinion, there is nothing wrong with having a good time on a Friday night, whatever an individual perceives that to be. Wilkinson is the individual who put a small amount of thought into his statement. He went for the easy joke and the easy solution: blame someone else. In fact Wilkinson pointed the finger just as Lazare did, without proof, without basis.

To the editor:

This is a response to Jessica May's article that was placed on the front page of October 3rd's Collegian: Yuck.

The article was reminiscent of a Salem witch hunt where names were posted on the doors of the Town Hall. Except these weren't the names of alleged heretics, they were the names of fellow students who committed a crime that today seems far worse, the crime of having a few drinks and being under twenty-one. Not only did they have a few drinks, but they also were caught by the campus police, a group that seems to strive for counter-existence instead of co-existence with students, feeling as if after arresting a few drunk kids they can turn UMass into Deerfield Academy overnight. Now I realize that a few of the "offenders" committed legitimate destructive crimes, but if "placing bottles of alcohol in a backpack" and "drinking 12 oz. cans of beer" are detestable and "arrestable" offenses, then I am also an offender. Yes, I admit, I, Daniel McPhee, took "12 oz. cans of beer" and "placed them into a backpack" on Friday night. And I think it's safe to say that almost ten thousand fellow students followed my lead. We all took the same risk. We will all do it again.

So some Jimmy Smits wannabe happened to see one of us do it and decided to blow it out of proportion. Then to top it off, the names of the poor kids who ran into Starsky and Hutch on Friday night get their names published in the most popular paper on campus, free for peers, coaches and professors to see. Is this any way to make news? From what I understand the Collegian is a student-run paper that serves students and voices their opinions. Its functions, from my understanding, do not include embarrassing other students and kissing up to cops. Let's keep it real.

BOONDOCK SAINTS (2000)
Directed by Troy Duffy
Starring: Willem Defoe, Sean Patrick Flanery, and Norman Reedus

Troy Duffy's first feature film is a mediocre success. Why would I choose a mediocre film for my weekly rental recommendation? Let me clarify. Troy Duffy's "Boondock Saints" is a very fast-paced enjoyable film. The characters are great, the action scenes are pretty inventive, and the dialogue is really funny. All in all, I was very pleased with the film.

So why call it mediocre? I guess deep down in credibility hell I know that it is not a "great" film. "Boondock Saints" easily falls into the Quentin Tarantino/Guy Ritchie/till in the blank action category. This film creates an inventive reason for masses and masses of guys (not to offend any women's study majors...they are all really guys...other wise I would have said people, or girls and guys, or Italian Americans of both genders...) to shoot the hell out of each other. Now here is a question for all you math majors: If there is only a pause of 3 minutes between action scenes and 3 of those 5 minutes are used for comic relief, how many minutes are left for plot development? If you said "2" out loud, I hope people are starring at you all like "what the hell is that person doing," and if you had to re-read the sentence, you should drop your major. Also the point is, Boondock Saints is not a great film because of the 2-minute time limit for plot and character development. Although, chances are that you will feel like you know the main characters more that you know any of your professors.

And now the plot synopsis: The "Boondock Saints" are fraternal twins, Conner (Flanery) and Murphey (Reedus) MacMannus. Inspired by a sermon given by their priest at the beginning of the film stating, "although we should fear evil men, we should fear the indifference of men more." – the hard-drinking Irish-American MacMannus brothers run off to rid Boston of crime with an uncanny assortment of weapons, a lot of booze, and God's will. Taking the "word" of God to run off and kill "evil" people? It's ok; there is nothing to fear...they are Irish Catholics. Heralded as saints by half of the city's residents, the brothers also attract the attention of Paul Smecker (Defoe). Willem Defoe plays this role with perfect absurdity – melodrama at its peak – like Jim Carey with blood lust.

Duffy's directorial and writing debut is wildly entertaining. It may not be a classic, but it is definitely a good film to rent before a long night of drinking. As usual, you will start drinking, say you are going to watch the film "later," get so drunk you forget you rented a film, and then watch it when you are hung over at noon the next day. That's what I did, and by the time it was over it was okay to eat again.

So, go to your local video store and rent "Boondock Saints," and if you have a DVD player, for god's sake go to DVDEN

An interview with DAR

COURTESY DARWILLIAMS.COM
Dar Williams will be playing at the Calvin Theatre tonight at 8 p.m.

By Kristen Delaney
The Mirror (Fairfield U.)

(U-WIRE) FAIRFIELD, Conn. – Dar Williams has played at the Quick Center before in 1999, and will be appearing this Thursday, Oct. 4, again at the Quick Center for another concert. In anticipation, The Mirror's Kristen Delaney has an exclusive interview with her.

KD: How does a college scene compare to that of other venues you have played?

DW: I think that a college, its students, are generally more game. They're really open to anything, and so it's a lot of fun to play at colleges.

KD: How is the Green World (produced in August of 2000) different from other albums you have made?

DW: We had a new producer and new musicians, and so every time that happens there's a changing of the guard. And, I was 4 years older when we recorded it. I've kind of left everyone else to decide how different it is, but certainly I've been through a lot of personal changes. That might have affected the new album.

KD: Like what kind of personal changes?

DW: Well, they're personal.

KD: You've lived in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and now you're back in New York. How do these different locations affect your music?

DW: The music surrounding me effects my years in terms of what kind of music I end up writing, I think. And, actually I just think it's because I travel so much. It's hard to say what inspires me or doesn't inspire me, but I think living in new places shakes me up. You're changing all the furniture, so you're changing all the metaphors. That happens from traveling as much as from moving. It's good, and it keeps you on your toes to move to a new place in general.

KD: When did your new live album come out?

DW: Last Tuesday.

KD: Is it drawn from one show, or a compilation of shows?

DW: It's from three shows, the last three shows of The Green World Tour from last year. But [the live album] covers all the albums.

KD: Why did you decide to do a live album?

DW: I had always thought I would do a live album sometime, and no sooner than after the fourth album. So it was right on time. I went on a 10-week tour with a band that I loved, and about 3 weeks into the tour, I called my manager and said we might have some material towards a live album. He set it up in a matter of weeks: got all the recording equipment together and all the people set up. Low and behold, a week later we recorded the show and discovered we had a full album of material.

KD: Where does the "Green World" reference come from?

DW: It comes from a Shakespearian lecture in a class in college. There was a separation between the green world and the closed world. The closed world was the world of laws and conventions and generally the court life, and the green world was the chaotic, usually literally green space, in which the characters would find themselves transformed by the ordering of the natural world, or by a reordering caused by chaos. A lot of times people would disguise themselves as the opposite sex, or find themselves under the spell of fairies, or discover that their enemies were their friends and friends were their enemies. Almost all of the narrators on the album have to face some chaotic transformative space, and often times have the challenge of bringing this information back to the closed world, and thus transforming it to the closed world.

KD: Are your songs more autobiographical, or are they created about fictional characters because of your interest in playwriting?

DW: Unfortunately, I don't really have an answer for that. If it's personally important for me to write these songs, they're obviously playing off of some aspect of who I am. But, I would say very few of them would ever be directly from me. A song is an interpretation. They're one level away from being something you'd write in a journal... but it brings in more elements and structure

In 1997 Usher released My Way, produced by Jermaine Dupri and executive produced by L.A. Reid and Babyface. The album was a huge success, spawning several hit singles and dominating the R&B charts for weeks and eventually going multi-platinum.

But in early 2001, as Usher was set to release his anticipated follow up, he became a subject of piracy when All About U tracks were leaked to the Internet music sharing service Napster. Arista ultimately opted to delay its release while the frustrated singer returned to the studio to record new tracks for the album.

Contrary to reports that the album was named after its release date, 8701 is Usher's retrospective album showing his maturation from 1987 to 2001. 8701 shows how Usher has grown up from the year he "found" music at the age of 9, to today when he stands in supposed maturity at the age of 23.

Is Usher a perfectionist? Is he like a mini-Michael Jackson (one of Usher's biggest idols, who is name-dropped on the upbeat "U-Turn" as Usher sings "MJ had everybody doin' the moonwalk"), who would invest precious time to reenter a studio to record all-new material?

Yes. And no. On the smooth follow-up to My Way, the heartthrob shows the polish of a showbiz veteran, albeit one afraid to take any big chances. Despite all the pouting and preening, Usher's voice is impressively adaptable – lacing brash beats from the Neptunes and sophisticated ballads from hit-makers Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis. But the album fails to show how much Usher has grown up between 1987 and 2001. The album's primary source of material is girls, girls, and more girls.

Nearly every single on 8701 is radio friendly, again showing Usher is afraid to take any chances outside the mainstream realm. At least he's able to show off his tight knit relationship to R&B tunes. For instance, "U Remind Me," a huge summer smash, displays Usher's signature dirty boy demeanor as the song centers on a salacious mind remembering many good things at once.

One of the more aggressive cuts on the album is "I Can't Let U Go" (What's his affection with the letter "U" anyway? The first letter of his name appears in 7 out of 13 song titles). But even in this brazen track, Usher's silky voice tones down its bold lyrics but doesn't underrate its stature as one of the best tracks on 8701.

The album draws close assimilation to late-night kings Marvin Gaye and, more recently, Jon B. On one of the album's most blatant examples, "Twork It Out" Usher sings about "kissing and rubbing and making sweet love."

Who can/will replace Phish?
Jam Central with Dave Siegel

By Dave Siegel
Collegian Staff

Hello! To those that do not know me, my name is Dave Siegel and I love my jambands! Over the last couple of years I have had the opportunity to see tons of shows and listen to even more on compact disc. By no means do I consider myself to be an expert, but I do think that I am well versed in the happenings of both the local and national jamband scene. With this out of the way, I would like to welcome you to the first installment of The Daily Collegian's newest column "Jam Central".

As of late, the jamband community has been struggling for its identity. For the last 15 or so years (not including this year), jambands have simply been categorized as bands that sound like Phish. Since its inception, the jamband scene has been swimming in a world of wonder. What is going to happen to this scene? Is somebody going to step up and lead it to the next level? The only answer that I can surmise for both of these somewhat rhetorical questions is – not yet. A band has yet to show up and take the place of the all-powerful Phish. A band like that comes around once in a great while, and by no means can one or even two bands take their place. I wonder if the scene will even ever return to what it was, if Phish continues into a permanent retirement.

One particularly large issue facing the jamband scene is whether some of these bands that are indeed vying to fill the void, are traveling up the popularity ladder too quickly. Two bands in particular come to mind. One of these bands, from the east coast, has never really gone where they thought they would. I am speaking of the boys from Buffalo – Moe. Did anyone else catch their recent switch of New Year's Eve venue? Until probably a month ago "Five Guys Named Moe" had been slotted to play the mammoth Pepsi Arena in beautiful downtown Albany. I can't even begin to understand what made these guys think they could possibly play this venue. I for one am extremely glad that they realized what they were doing and switched to the much smaller Asbury Park Convention Center in New Jersey.

The other band for which I have concern is my personal favorite – The String Cheese Incident. These guys, in my opinion, have the best opportunity to "strike it big." They have a varied enough sound to sufficiently make the jamband fans happy, as and aspire to be beyond personal.

KD: How do you differentiate between yourself and your influences: what is "them" and what is "you"?

DW: I don't. That's a question for other people to answer. When I was 22, I had a Joni Mitchell/Joan Baez moratorium. I think that that they have what I call infectious voices. It's hard not to want to sing like them. And, of course I ended my Joan Baez moratorium because we ended up touring together. There are people who sound like other people, and you feel like if they're ever going to find their feet as touring artists they need to break every record by the person they love the most. Shawn Colvin, Joni Mitchell, Ani DiFranco, Joan Baez. The four of them have really incredible voices that are so distinctive that it's a little contagious I think.

KD: Where do you see yourself going in the future?

DW: I hope that I can expand my media so as to write books and plays... and songs for other people. I have that sort of a personal desire because I think it would challenge me. It doesn't feel healthy to become too structured about doing what you do "right," doing what you do "well." So there's a desire to expand, and there's a desire to have kids and get off the road. That said, I think touring will be a part of my life for a long time.

KD: So you don't want to completely leave the music scene?

well as pull in enough new followers from other genres. The upcoming fall tour is highly influential in shaping where this band can go. String Cheese is playing some extremely big rooms, especially in the Northeast. Possibly the biggest is here at our wonderful arena, The Mullins Center. Out west, I have no doubt as to where they could fill up a place of this size. Just look at the huge turnout they got for their Horning's Hideout – but that was in Oregon. The Mullins Center show will be awesome, if not simply for its mere grandeur but more for what its implications are for the entire scene. Can a band from this genre pull it off? I just don't know. A show like this also gives us a chance to prove how receptive we are as a jamband community. I believe that the UMASS/Northampton area is the best place in the state for live music. If you're interested in going to this show, I would recommend buying a ticket before the show simply to get a better seat.

New Sound of the Week: An amazing new band is on the scene, originally hailing from Georgia before their move to California, called Sound Tribe Sector 9. In the true sense of the word, these guys are sheer innovators. They bolster a very electronic sound, while also really jamming out. They have developed a unique sound that transcends categorization. As I have not seen them yet, I certainly hope they will come around soon. Check them out at www.st-s9.com.

Upcoming Shows: Kind of slow this week – there's the continuation of Wax Poets, Thursday night residents at the Iron Horse and popsters O.A.R upstairs at Pearl Street.

Denzel Washington and Ethan Hawke star in Training Day, opening in theaters today. Also coming to theaters this weekend: Serendipity, Joy Ride, and Max Keeble's Big Move.

■ Usher

"U Got It Bad," with a slow and deep vibe, is one of the most tender ballads on the album. It talks about a lover who's so madly and deeply in love that "u keep on thinkin' 'bout somebody else" and "u act like u ready but u don't really know." Usher wraps his silky vocals around an even slower ballad on "Can U Help Me" asking for his girl to help him work out their crumbling relationship.

Usher's asking for a backhand from the female population with his ego-driven "If I Want To" as he hums "If I wanted I could take U from ya man" and "I could have U eatin' out the palm of my hand/ and all your girlfriends too." Nevertheless, its cool rhythm and hot beat makes the song irresistible.

With the same slow jams cooed with a velvety voice it's safe to say 8701 will appeal to the same crowd as did My Way four years ago. 8701 doesn't reinvent contemporary R&B. The album is another example that a cadre of guest vocals and a slew of production experts don't necessarily equate to a revolutionary album. At least Usher's liking of the same old R&B is well-composed, resulting in beautiful songs about love.

Survivor in Africa boasts two Mass. natives

By Joe Welch
Tufts Daily (Tufts U.)

(U-Wire) BOSTON – On safari in the African plains, complete with hungry leopards and circling vultures, doesn't sound like the type of place where Harvard University career counselors would be hanging out. Especially if they have to contend with Immunity Challenges along with the bloodthirsty bugs.

But for 44-year-old Linda Spencer, the wild animals and blistering heat of Kenya's Shaba National Reserve – home to Survivor: Africa, CBS's newest reality show – are simply the price to pay for a shot at $1 million.

The show, which scored sky-high ratings during its previous two runs, promises a $1 million prize to a single winner – and nothing to the 15 losers. The contestants are split into two tribes, and work together to complete various challenges, voting one person off the show at a Tribal Council at the end of each segment.

Spencer, assistant director of Harvard's career services office, received her master's degree in education at Tufts. Her resume reveals that she's not so unlikely a candidate for the show, either: Spencer has previously served as director of African Adventures at an overseas adventure travel company and spent two summers in African villages that did not have running water or electricity, according to CBS's Spencer's personal profile posted on the network's Survivor website. Reveals that while she has had her share of setbacks, she's managed to fight back – and stay incredibly active. Diagnosed with thyroid cancer in December 1988, Spencer went through a thyroidectomy the next month and later received radioactive iodine treatments.

But Spencer beat her cancer and climbed to the summit of Washington's Mt. Rainier this September following her diagnosis. Mountain climbing, incidentally, is one of her hobbies – along with ice climbing and winter camping.

Previous to the show's taping, which took place in July and August, TV Guide reported on security concerns for the Kenya setting. This weren't talking about protecting information relating to the outcome of the show, though.

The article cited worries about the threat of terrorist attacks on American citizens in Kenya, where a 1998 bombing of the nation's U.S. embassy killed 213 and injured thousands. The country also has an unusually high crime rate.

CBS upped its security budget and publicly downplayed any perceived hazards, according to TV Guide. The show completed taping without incident, but Americans soon learned the full reality of a terrorist threat after four passenger planes were systematically hijacked on Sept. 11, slamming into New York's World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Survivor: Africa will debut one month to the day after Terror Tuesday. CBS now faces the unusual situation that Americans may have lived through a little too much reality to be in the mood for more so-called "reality TV."

Associate TA College director Howard Woolf says that while the numbers aren't in yet, the networks are going to have to do some active editing in order to maintain viewership.

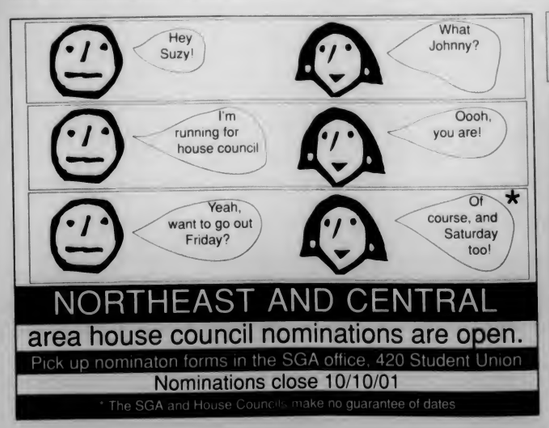
"This might tone down some of the carping, the fighting, and emphasize more of the cooperation," he said of Survivor's producers.

Woolf believes that audiences may be turned off by bitter rivalries that are usually inherent in reality TV. The problem is that the pacts contestants are considered by many to be mostly responsible for the skyrocketing popularity of reality shows.

"I would guess there would be some dread-lection for the entire concept [of reality TV]," Woolf said. "They're based on the worst concept of people, and nobody wants to see that right now."

Much of the entertainment media's worry lies in the sheer uncertainty of public reaction during the coming months, says sociology professor and former director of the Communications and Media Studies program Paul Lopes. And he insists that CBS isn't the only one worrying.

"Media producers are not sure what the impact of these events are – in terms of reality TV in terms of masses, in terms of mass," he said. The media certainly appear to be erring on the side of caution, though. Many radio station producers – worried about the appropriateness of insensitivity in wake of the attacks – have banned songs that some could view as eerily reminiscent of the attacks, such as Alanis Morissette's "Ironic" or Dave Matthews Band's "Crash Into Me."



Over time, Lopes believes that the attacks will not significantly affect American media culture. But for now, he says it's anyone's guess.

"Everyone's trying to figure out, 'Are we in a new world, and if so, how do we deal with it?'" Lopes said.

Last April, then-Tufts junior Curt Wilson lived in a tent on the roof of Tisch Library for five days, depriving himself of a change of clothes or a shower, as a backdrop to his taped audition for Survivor's third season. While Wilson's application was ultimately rejected, he says he'll still follow the show closely.

"I thought I had a chance, but they had to look at thousands of videos," Wilson said, adding that he still had fun making the video.

Since Survivor: Africa was filmed over the summer, most of its contestants know how they fared. The finalists, however, will appear on a live broadcast at the end of the series for the final episode, Survivor: Africa – Reunion Out! 11 at 8 p.m. on CBS.

schedule.

Two strong, young forwards lead the La Salle squad. Last week's A-10 Co-Player of the Week, Amy Schneider, who scored both goals in the victory over Fordham, and preseason all-conference selection Krista Lee guide the Explorer attack. The junior and sophomore, respectively, are tied for the team lead in points with four.

Rudy's squad will put off worrying about Schneider and Lee, however, until Friday's game is behind them, truly subscribing to the theory of "one game at a time."

"We'll [discuss La Salle] on Saturday," Cook said.

With the Explorers' 2-1 record at home, the team will have plenty to discuss during that off-day.

This weekend in New York and Pennsylvania will begin the most important run of the regular season for the Maroon and White. Ahead for the Minutewomen are seven straight games that will help define whether the 2001 season is a success or failure..

UMass will head to Princeton next weekend for the highly touted Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Tournament. The event hosts the top 16 teams in the region.

The Minutewomen finish up their autumn tenure Oct. 20 when they host St. John's.

Down to just five players on their active roster, Coach Dixon and company are ready to get through these final days of the September-October warm-up.

Wednesday, the Minutewomen had to sweep the doubles and take four of five singles matches in order to win the match. But they couldn't overcome the deficit.

Because of its lacking number of players, UMass was forced to default the points at No. 3 doubles and No. 6 singles.

Fortunately, the fall matches have no effect on the spring season.

Dixon said yesterday the focus for the rest of the present period will be on "individual efforts."

a pair of games cancelled against field hockey powerhouses, Maryland and Louisville.

Almost exactly a year ago (Oct. 7, 2000), these two teams squared off in a defensive struggle that the Orangewomen won 1-0, despite being severely outplayed. This year, the Maroon and White has been generating more offense, so it is almost assured of avoiding a goose egg on the scoreboard, but it has also been allowing more goals. Syracuse, on the other hand, has continued its stifling defensive play from last season, posting shutouts in four of its seven wins.

Despite the fact that the Orangewomen will be a tough opponent for UMass, Monaco seems to think that if anything, the game will come down to how well her own team plays.

"We took some rough steps early on," the Oxford, Mass. native said. "To take another step back now [after a confidence boosting win] would be critical."

After the contest at Syracuse, the Minutewomen will finally return home to challenge Providence College on Oct. 10. And for all the Massachusetts players, it will be a relief to once again play on Garber Field.

"There is nothing like playing on your home field," Monaco said. "Next Wednesday I am going to be psyched. We all are. We don't have many home games this year, so it will be nice."

So I was bagging groceries at the supermarket, and I ask this old lady if she wants paper or plastic. She says, "Bags." Right. Obviously she wants bags. Since there are two choices, I ask her which kind of "bags" she'd prefer. She says, "Wooden bags." Wooden bags? What the hell is that? So I ask her, "What the hell are wooden bags, lady?"

What did she say?

She didn't hear me. Apparently she was deaf in her right ear. So I threw all her groceries in plastic bags and went on break.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – They say love is a two-way street, but today you may have to hog the road in order to make any headway. The Collegian offers one solution: the fists.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can improve your own outlook, and your productivity, simply by accepting current limitations and beginning to work with them willingly.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may find yourself entangled in a bittersweet triangle of sorts. Others involved are likely to depend upon you for a solution. But you don't have one. So tell them to ask Jeeves.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You must resist the temptation to capitalize on another's misfortune today, despite your need to increase the pace of your progress. Yeah, so you're selfish, who isn't?

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You'll want to do things in your own way today – to the extent that others may back away and leave you very much alone for a time. Kind of how the Goonies left Chunk alone with Sloth. It all works out in the end. Just make sure you have plenty of Rocky Rooooaaaaad!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – It's up to you to keep deception out of the picture today. During evening hours, a misunderstanding may bring tensions to the boiling point. Add ice.

Road a familiar place for UMass field hockey

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Home games have been few and far between for the Massachusetts field hockey team. In fact, through eight games, the Minutewomen have only trotted onto the friendly confines of Richard F. Garber Field once – that being a Sept. 5 win over Boston College.

During the rest of the season, the Maroon and White has been traveling all over the place, visiting colleges as far away as Ann Arbor, Mich. for a pair of games against the Wolverines and Indiana University.

This Saturday, the road trip continues, as UMass (2-5, 0-0 Atlantic 10) heads up north to challenge the Syracuse Orangewomen (7-2, 2-0 Big East).

All signs point to the Orangewomen being a very formidable opponent, but nonetheless, the Minutewomen are hoping to build on Wednesday's 2-1 victory over Boston University.

"That was a really important game," said freshman midfielder Adrianne Monaco, who has continued to garner more playing time with each consecutive game. "We brought stuff together that we had been working on and hopefully we can use the win as a stepping stone."

In the latest STX/NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll, Syracuse secured a No. 19 ranking, making it the only team in its conference to gain a top 20 berth. So far on the season, the Orangewomen have posted quality wins against Boston College, Rutgers and Miami (OH), leading to their high position in the standings.

Leading the offense for Syracuse is a pair of sisters, Michelle and Kristen Aronowicz. Both have been equally impressive thus far, and have continually fought each other for the position of top goal scorer on the team. Right now, Kristen is winning the battle, seven goals to six, but Michelle has bested her sister when it comes to points earned, thanks to her five assists.

However, the Maroon and White will do nothing in particular to stop the Aronowicz attack.

"We are going to try and play so that they can't even get the ball," Monaco said. "But we do that every game. Coach likes us to not let [any opponents] receive passes."

Also pivotal to the Orangewomen attack is redshirt freshman Ann-Marie Guglien, who has posted well-rounded numbers (four goals and four assists) on the year. In goal, Audrey Latsko provides experience and skill along with a stupendous 1.15 goals against average.

One promising sign for the Maroon and White, despite the differences in records, is that the Minutewomen have played a much more difficult schedule than Syracuse. Easy wins against Albany, West Chester, Colgate and Fairfield have boosted the Orangewomen's record, while simultaneously failing to offer much of a challenge.

In contrast, UMass has taken on No. 4 Michigan, UConn, Harvard and UNH and had

Minutewomen prepare for start of A-10 slate

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Trying to avoid its first two-game losing streak of the season, the Massachusetts women's soccer team (4-2, 1-0 Atlantic 10) will take to the pitch outside the Bay State for the first time in its 2001 campaign, to face two A-10 rivals that are winless against the Maroon and White.

Coach Jim Rudy's squad will first head to Bronx, N.Y. this afternoon to square off against Fordham, the first of seven straight A-10 matches for UMass. The Rams have bounced back after a tough 2000 campaign which ended with them winning less than one-third of their games (6-11-2, 2-7-1 A-10) and dropping their all-time record to 0-6 against UMass.

But just because they have been successful in the past against UL don't expect the Minutewomen to overlook the New Yorkers.

"We know that every A-10 game is an important one," said UMass captain Sarah Cook, also pointing out that no in-conference teams, no matter how much success her squad has had against them in the past, would be treated as walkovers.

Fordham's 2001 version, however, has been more successful than ever before. The Rams won their first two games and have compiled a 5-2 record, with one of their losses coming in the team's only conference game to date.

"[Fordham] is off to the best start in the history of their program," said Cook.

Freshman plays on the defensive side has been a key to Fordham's success. Westchester County native Dana Actara received the preseason honors (A-10 all-rookie team) and has not disappointed. Actara is currently tied for fourth on the team in points scored, but classmate Cores Dunfrey has surpassed all expectations thus far and was named conference co-rookie of the week after scoring her third goal of the season, a game-winner, against Lafayette last week.

The Minutewomen will then round out the weekend Sunday in Philadelphia with a match against La Salle. The Explorers (2-5, 1-0 A-10) are a woeful 0-4 against UMass all-time, but shut out Fordham last weekend, 2-0.

La Salle had lost three straight prior to the victory over the Rams and needed the shutout, which also featured the most goals scored for the team in one game all year, to get back on track in time for the in-conference section of the

Double dose of conference foes this weekend for Minutemen

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

The road to the Atlantic 10 Championship is a long one and for the Massachusetts men's soccer team, the journey has just begun.

The Minutemen are coming off a double overtime loss last Saturday in their first A-10 game of the season against Rhode Island, and are looking for better results this weekend with two conference match-ups.

UMass will take on Fordham today in it's first game since the 3-2 loss to URI last weekend. Fordham recently started its A-10 series against LaSalle, losing 3-0. The Minutemen played Fordham in the closing stages of last season, shutting out the Rams 3-0. That game in Bronx, N.Y. earned UMass its second consecutive trip to the A-10 tourney.

Although it's only the first weekend in October, UMass knows a win in today's game will help edge them a little closer to the post-season. The Minutemen can only count on themselves now. Head coach Sam Koch said that his team would work to stay organized defensively and communicate while moving the ball up the field.

"We will take care of what we need to do as a team," Koch said. "We'll stick to the game plan and execute it."

Max Wolf, a senior midfielder, scored his first goal of the season against URI last weekend. Wolf has been playing strong defensively for the Minutemen this season and is now stepping up on the offensive side.

"He [Wolf] is handling the ball well, and defensively he's playing much better," Koch said.

The Minutemen will also meet up with LaSalle this weekend at home in a rematch from the closing game of last season in which the Maroon and White won 2-1. UMass played a tight 90 minutes against the Explorers, and Jeff Doren scoring the winning goal with just 21 seconds left in regulation play. LaSalle will come into the game Sunday after playing URI today. The Explorers have already defeated Fordham, giving them an A-10 record of 1-0. But Koch isn't over-concerned with the records that the conference teams are posting.

"Records go out the window," Koch said.

The win against LaSalle last season gave the Minutemen the shared title of the A-10 regular season with Dayton, as both teams finished 8-1-1. UMass earned the regular season title last season for the first time in six years, but the team was quick to come home after losing to Rhode Island in the A-10 semifinals.

Coach Koch is not looking past the weekend in terms of the season. Koch said that his concern right now was Fordham and that the team is just looking to "come out and play well".

Game time for today's game against Fordham is 3:30 p.m., and Sunday's contest against LaSalle is at 1 p.m. Both games will be played at Totman Field.

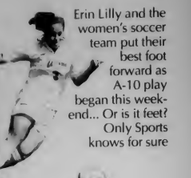
Match with rival Amherst postponed

Massachusetts women's tennis coach Judy Dixon announced yesterday morning that UMass's afternoon match with Amherst College had been postponed.

Already rescheduled from Sept. 18, the match will now be bumped into the spring slate.

The Minutewomen, who lost to UConn 6-1 yesterday at the Upper Boyden Courts, now stand at 1-1 in the fall campaign. The team beat Fordham 4-2 on Monday.



Amherst has won both of its matches this season, and is looking to return to the Division III Final Four for the fifth consecutive year.

Fire engulfs fraternity house; 23 members left homeless

By Jessica May and Bill Larkin
Collegian Staff

Twenty-three University of Massachusetts Delta Upsilon (DU) fraternity brothers lost their homes on Friday, Oct. 5, when a fire consumed their three-story house on 778 North Pleasant St.

According to the Hampshire Gazette, the blaze started when a candle in a first floor room lit a mattress on fire and spread to the right half of the house. None of the residents, including the house dog, were injured. Because the brothers covered their house's fire detectors with plastic bags, the blaze had grown out of control by the time the Amherst Fire Department arrived, Amherst Fire Chief Keith Hoyle said.

The Gazette reported that the brothers may face criminal charges from the Amherst Police Department stemming from their obstruction of the fire detectors.

By 5:15 p.m., nearly an hour after the fire began, the house "was pretty much totaled," Hoyle said. Although the building still stands, the first floor suffered smoke and water damage, the second and third floor were completely burned, and the right half of the roof collapsed, he said.

The Amherst Fire Department deployed 35 firefighters to join four Northampton fire fighters and UMass student volunteers in combating the blaze. Four firefighters suffered minor injuries and were later released on the scene after receiving treatment for dehydration, Hoyle said.

According to DU Executive Director Abe Cross, a "housing corporation" consisting of UMass DU alumni owns the house, which the Amherst Assessor's office valued at $538,800. Cross said the house "is fully insured by a property program supported by other DU chapters, and we plan to build the best fraternity house possible on that property."

Jason Hollis ('94), the treasurer of the alumni corporation that owns the house, said that while the house will be rebuilt within two years, they "can't live in it until its done."

The University allowed the homeless brothers to stay at the Campus Center Hotel until Tuesday, when Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin scheduled separate meetings with each student to discuss "future housing accommodations." Because the University doesn't "have a bed to be had," Vanin said that local boarding houses such as the University Lodge would be contacted to negotiate possible living arrangements for the displaced students.

In addition, the brothers met with Director of Greek Affairs Mike Wiseman last night to discuss future housing possibilities. According to Richard Graham, an executive officer at DU, the Delta Chi, Phi Mu Delta, and Phi Sigma Kappa fraternities offered to house the brothers for the remainder of the semester. The Alpha Chi Omega, Iota Gamma Upsilon, and Sigma Kappa sororities have offered the brothers clothing, food and water, Graham said.

Speaking over the whistle of fire houses and the squeals of sirens, Vanin gave the brothers an emergency telephone number they could contact for emergency clothes and food vouchers. In addition, Vanin promised the brothers that her office would send a letter to their teachers informing them about the fire and asking for their leniency over the upcoming weeks. She said she was starting a "small loan fund" from which students could replace their textbooks.

Like most of his fellow brothers, Eric Gibbons, a sophomore Management major, lost nearly all of his possessions in the fire, including a $1,000 stereo system, a $900 computer, and $300 worth of books. Although the house is insured, Gibbons may have to replace his possessions himself because he does not have homeowners insurance.

"I thought my parents' insurance would cover me," he said. "But because I live off campus, I think I'm out of luck."

Initial strikes against Afghanistan launched

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The United States and British armed forces conducted a "very successful" attack on 30 sites in Afghanistan with missiles and bombs, according to officials.

"Based on our early assessment, we believe that we have made progress toward eliminating the air defense sites that have located around the country," Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said in a briefing yesterday afternoon. "We also believe we've made an impact on the military airfields that were targeted."

Targets included al Qaeda training camps and Taliban military installations, according to British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

"At 5:30 p.m. British Time [1:30 p.m. EDT] yesterday [Sunday] a series of air and cruise missile attacks began on the terrorist camps of Osama bin Laden and the military installations of the Taliban regime," Blair told a recalled Parliament. "These were carried out by American and British armed forces with the support of other allies."

Blair went on to explain the targets were mostly located outside major settlements, but that three were located near Kabul, the capital of Afghanistan. Four other targets were near large cities, Blair added.

The Pentagon stressed that no civilians or civilian population centers were targeted.

"Every target was a military target. The reports indicating that there were attacks on Kabul are incorrect," Rumsfeld said. "The attacks were on the military targets surrounding the city. All U.S. military personnel and aircraft that took part in yesterday's strike are safe and accounted for, notwithstanding the statements by Taliban to the contrary, which are flat untrue. We believe the humanitarian assistance flights were successful, and they will continue today."

Over 37,000 meals were air dropped to starvation-plagued areas on Monday, the Department of Defense said in a released statement.

General Richard Meyers, Chair of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said that the strikes were against a "broad" range of targets, and that for now, early objectives have been completed.

"The broad category of targets that we struck yesterday included early-warning radars, as we said before, ground forces, command-and-control facilities, al Qaeda infrastructure, and airfields and aircraft," Meyers said in a Defense Department briefing. "We did destroy some of the terrorist infrastructure and we did begin feeding and assisting the victims of the Taliban regime. Our Day One efforts were designed to disrupt and destroy terrorist activities in Afghanistan and to set the conditions for future military action and to bring food and medical supplies to the Afghan people.

"Strikes are continuing as we speak. We are hitting targets that are similar to those we did yesterday," Meyers continued. "Today we're using about five bomber aircraft and about 10 carrier-based tactical aviation assets to conduct our operations."

Prime Minister Blair said the Britain would support the United States on all fronts.

"We are taking action therefore on all those three fronts: military, diplomatic and humanitarian. I also want to say very directly to the British people why this matters so much directly to Britain," Blair said. "Let us not forget that the attacks of the Sept. 11 represented the worst terrorist outrage against British citizens in our history. The murder of British citizens, whether it happens overseas or not, is an attack upon Britain."

Lecture promotes new economic theory

By Bill Larkin
Collegian Staff

Dada Maheshvarananda, a representative of the Proutist Universal social reform organization, spoke to a group of 20 students from the five-college area at the Episcopal Chaplaincy in Amherst, on Thursday, Oct. 4.

In the speech, Maheshvarananda, an author, monk and yoga and meditation teacher, promoted the progressive utilization theory (PROUT). The theory is a socio-economic philosophy that guarantees economic democracy and the distribution of food, shelter, clothing, health care and education to all people.

"What we have doesn't work, there is no need for poverty and hunger. If we don't create a better world that is sustainable, our earth will perish," Maheshvarananda said.

According to Maheshvarananda, the structural adjustment policies of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) allow multinational corporations to create a system where "some people roll in riches while others die wallowing in poverty."

Dressed in an orange robe symbolizing service and sacrifice, Maheshvarananda said 1.2 billion people live on less than $1 a day in abject misery on a planet that possesses the economic, scientific and technological abilities to end suffering. In Brazil, where he has worked, for the past 25 years, with social actions such as the Landless People's Movement and Liberation Theology. He explained that the government spends $1 on social programs for every $2 it spends to reduce debt to the World Bank.

The "psycho-economic" exploitation generated by the World Bank, the IMF, and the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) has undermined popular will, Maheshvarananda said.

According to Maheshvarananda, when the financial contributions of multinational corporations render democratic elections meaningless, they "control society with an invisible hand." This July, when 200,000 protesters urged world leaders at the G8 Summit in Genoa, Italy to press the World Bank and the IMF to drop the debt of the world's poorest countries, the American government sent 75 representatives to "safeguard corporate interests," he said.

Because the conglomerate capitalist ownership that controls the news depends on the consistency of the stock market, publishers preach that media consumers cannot change the world, Maheshvarananda said. In addition, the structural adjustment policies of the World Bank and IMF have privatized primary and secondary education in the Third World, presenting students with advertising and propaganda, he said.

Protected by obscurity, the Chinese Communist Party has oppressed the language and culture of impoverished Tibetan villagers, Maheshvarananda said. Instead of protesting poverty, the Brazilian people have not formed a "culture of resistance," producing art, literature, movies and music that glorifies complacency.

Last year, Maheshvarananda said, 2,000 Nobel Prize laureates signed a letter stating that the world will perish if it continues to abuse its resources. Therefore, he said he has dedicated his life to social change by teaching a vision of a world free from global colonialism.

Because our current economies "strive for profit at any cost," Maheshvarananda said, governments across the world need to establish higher minimum wages and place a "ceiling over profits" so that people can live without fear of hunger and

UMass students speak out about US airstrikes

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts expressed a number of reactions ranging from horror to support following the United States military's assault on Afghanistan this week.

Yesterday was the second day of attacks against the country, as the US sent out cruise missiles and various aircraft to both fire missiles and drop food and supplies to the people within the country. Targets of the attack flights included air defense installations and control stations that belonged to the ruling Taliban. The military targets surrounding the capital of Kabul and four other major cities in Afghanistan were all sites of the attacks as the conflict escalated to war when Afghanistan refused to give up suspected terrorist leader Osama bin Laden.

Many UMass students voiced their frustrations and support about the whole incident, explaining that they wished that there was more information made available to the people in order to better understand both why Afghanistan was bombed and what the status was of causalities on both sides. Karen Poirier, a sophomore Animal Science major, explained that although she was a little disappointed by the lack of information that the American people had been given, she understood why it was not available.

"If information got out it could deter national security," Poirier said. "More information could get leaked out to other countries."

Another student was upset at the lack of information, citing that there were some things that Americans could be told.

"I am a little frustrated about the lack of information that is being released to the American public," Andrew Spagnoli a junior Political Science major explained. "A good deal of information could be released without jeopardizing safety."

Spagnoli explained that he was concerned about innocent lives being lost at the cost of the bombings but praised the fact that the United States had been dropping packages of food along with the bombs.

"I support taking action, not hurting innocent people," Spagnoli said. "I think that any military action needs to be balanced out with aid, a majority of the people in that area have had a difficult time."

Freshman Math major Drew Barraford was hopeful about the situation, predicting a quick end to the attacks.

"I think that assault will last possibly a week or two," Barraford said. "A month at the most."

Leslie Lopez, a junior Political Science major, had an opposing opinion. She explained that the American people had been blind to issues that had been going on between the two countries for years.

"A lot of people have no clue what has been going on between us and the Taliban for many years," Lopez said. "We need to realize how far this goes back."

Lopez cautioned that the bombings may go on for sometime and that the actions of the Taliban came out of "frustration and hate" towards the United States and their policies.

"This is probably going to go on for a very, very long time," Lopez said. "It's not just about bombing a couple of sites, it is hard to fight a war against terrorism. If we go about it the wrong way then [the Taliban government] is going to get more support."

Oklahoma

By George Zebolski
Oklahoma Daily (U. Oklahoma)

(U-WIRE) NORMAN, Okla. – Each year the Sooners and Longhorns meet in the Cotton Bowl for the Red River Shootout. But the game is only one part of the rivalry.

Fans for University of Oklahoma and University of Texas-Austin descend on the West End in Dallas, walking the streets to proclaim the dominance of their favorite team. The rivalry can range from friendly banter to being downright nasty. Jim Tillison of Oklahoma City paid to park in the West End, but when he and his family returned to his Ford minivan, he found it blocked in by a Texas fan's car.

"It's typical Texas," Tillison said. "They blocked us in like (UT football head coach) Mack Brown couldn't."

Tillison and his family tried to maneuver his car around the one blocking him in, but couldn't make his way around the bumper. That's when Tillison received some unexpected help.

A group of Texas fans came by and, joining in with Sooner fans, lifted the rear end of the van inch by inch until it cleared the car blocking it in.

Although Tillison and his family expressed thanks to the Horn backers, their opinion remained that "Texas sucks."

Afterward, Tillison said he still couldn't believe what had happened.

"That was all right," Tillison said. "I guess they like us more than we like them."

At the game one Sooner fan was seeing the rivalry from a different perspective. Former defensive back Ontei Jones was a member of last year's national championship team. On Saturday he watched the game from the sidelines dressed in plain clothes. The Miami native said he has learned a lot about the hate between OU and Texas from his new perspective.

"This is my first time to see how intense the rivalry really is," Jones said.

Before the game, Jones said he was confident the Sooners would win. They did, 14-3.

After the game, Sooner fans wore their colors proudly, having earned bragging rights on the Cotton Bowl field.

One group of Texas fans were happy with the outcome. They were asked by a group of OU fans why they were happy.

Their answer: "Because it wasn't 63-14."

Iowa

The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

(U-WIRE) IOWA CITY, Iowa – The drink comes in a sleek blue and silver can and tramples the taste of alcohol.

Red Bull Energy Drink mixed with vodka has grown increasingly popular with local bar patrons, but some health experts say the product is suspected in connection with three deaths in Sweden – might have harmful effects.

The drink might be dangerous when mixed with vodka because its flavor masks the taste of alcohol, making it difficult to gauge how much alcohol has been consumed, said Kathy Mellen, a dietitian for Health Iowa. Red Bull contains almost as much caffeine as coffee, she said, and the stimulant disguises some of the effects of alcohol, a depressant.

The Swedish National Food Administration reportedly is investigating Red Bull because three people died shortly after consuming the drink. The group issued a recommendation early this year not to consume such energy drinks to quench thirst or in combination with alcohol.

"It doesn't make a lot of medical sense," said Eric Evans, a doctor with University of Iowa Student Health. "The symptoms might not be what one would expect from a stimulant or depressant alone."

Local bar employees said despite such warnings, the drink has grown in popularity.

"There are a few drinks that have been a mainstay here for a while, and Red Bull and vodka has moved right in," said Matt Wilson, manager of the Sports Column.

UI junior Scott Momsma said he frequently drinks Red Bull mixed with alcohol and finds the drink a good stimulant.

"Last weekend I was tired, I was kind of dragging," he said. "[Red Bull and vodka is] a good kicker because of all the caffeine."

Consuming stimulants with alcohol can result in dangerously high blood pressure and heart palpitations, Mellen said. Caffeine and alcohol each individually dehydrates the body, and mixing the two worsens the effect, she said.

Mellen said Red Bull and vodka poses more dangers than other mixed drinks, such as rum and Coke, because of its higher caffeine content.

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. – More than 500 University of Michigan students met Saturday to demonstrate that Mahatama Gandhi's spirit for social change is alive and well.

Students gathered on the Diag Saturday morning to take part in the fifth annual Gandhi Day of Service, spunsored by the Indian American Student Association and Project SERVE. Established at the University in 1997, Gandhi Day of Service expanded to a national level in 1999. This year more than 40 universities and organizations across the nation participated.

"We started it to promote Gandhi's values through community service, to honor him and the community at the same time," said Reshma Shah, IASA service co-chairwoman. "It gets students, namely freshmen, interested in service and brings them back to participate in other University service organizations. It helps them understand that what they do is really something important."

"The whole point is to get people involved in a lifetime commitment to community service," Project SERVE member Megan Memmer said.

Volunteers were divided into teams and sent to one of 20 different sites in the Detroit area, donating more than 2,500 man-hours of community service. Projects included cleaning up the Huron River and helping out at Riverview Nursing Home, the Ann Arbor, Mich., Hands-On Museum and the Chinmaya Mission.

Before the volunteers dispersed, a brief ceremony took place on the Diag.

With the Sept. 11 attacks in mind, IASA political awareness Chairman Abhishek Aaphale emphasized the reality of current problems caused by intolerance and suggested nonviolence can "rectify all injustices."

"Tolerance is my greatest teacher," he said, quoting Gandhi.

Royster Harper, the University's vice president for student affairs, encouraged students to take an active role in social change.

"We always enjoy being a part of Gandhi Day. They always send sweet people who are willing to do anything," said Ann Smith, volunteer coordinator at the Ann Arbor Hands-On Museum.

Rhode Island

The Good Five Cent Cigar (U. Rhode Island)

(U-WIRE) KINGSTON, R.I. – University of Rhode Island students can say goodbye to copyrighted MP3 downloads and copyrighted music video downloads as university officials comply with the U.S. Digital Millennium Copyright Act. The university received word of the act two weeks ago, said Paul B. Gandel, vice provost for information services and dean of university libraries.

"We got a notification from the music industry saying such and such computers have downloaded copyrighted material," Gandel said.

While various music industry agencies are contacting universities with lists of computer IP port addresses violating copyright laws, Sony Music Entertainment is the predominant company in contact with URI, said Christopher W. Wessells, director of the office of information services, special projects and business operator.

Gandel stressed the importance of conveying it is not the university that is monitoring computer downloads. Wessells said he believes the agencies monitoring the downloads are using special software programs allowing them to track computers downloading copyrighted files.

When the university receives the list of IP addresses, the ports are temporarily shut off and the users receive a message instructing them to see the library computer help desk. Once students report to the desk, they are given a form titled, URI Assurance Form: Music and Video Copyright.

The form asks the student to sign, saying they are aware they were in violation of copyright law and will not continue downloads of copyrighted information.

Gandel said it is important for students who were wrongly accused to contest it.

"If a student does feel wrongly accused they have the right to contest this," he said.

Since URI initiated the procedure to notify students they have been accused of illegal downloads, Gandel and Wessells said 18 students were identified. However, several of these are repeat offenders who were downloading more than one song when they were traced.

If the university is notified that a student is a repeat offender after they have signed the assurance form, Gandel said the university would have to forward that student's name to Fran Cohen, dean of students. Gandel said students are also notified they may be subject to state or federal judicial action.

"The best thing I can suggest is to follow the law and not download copyrighted information," Gandel said.

In addition to the university's efforts to comply with law surrounding copyrighted downloads, efforts have also been made to restructure the network's bandwidth.

URI has used a technique called traffic shaping to improve the speed of the Internet. Traffic shaping includes placing music downloads at the lowest priority, thus reserving the highest priority for academic work.

Gandel said the main problem with the network is the current bandwidth is not enough. Technological advancements have forced students and faculty members to use the Internet.

"The problem is there is so much need," Gandel said. "The network has never had enough connectivity."

He also noted the bond money used to fund the network is running out and unless it is replaced, students may have to pay for the service in the residence halls just as they would telephone service.

The strikes utilized Tomahawk cruise missiles launched from ships, such as the cruiser USS Philippine Sea and the British submarine HMS Trafalgar. It is the first time the British have used the Tomahawk missile operationally. Bomber aircraft were also used, although no Tomahawks were launched from the air.

The Pentagon said that the attacks are the first waves in the war on terrorism, designed to clear the way for further phases of Operation Enduring Freedom, the campaign to stamp out global terrorism.

"These strikes are part of a much larger effort against worldwide terrorism, one that will be sustained and which is wide-ranging. It will likely be sustained for a period of years, not weeks or months," Rumsfeld said. "This campaign will be waged much like the Cold War, in the sense that it will involve many fronts over a period of time and will require continuous pressure by a large number of countries around the globe.

"We will not stop until the terrorist networks are destroyed. To that end, regimes that harbor terrorists and their training camps should know that they will suffer penalties," Rumsfeld said. "Our goal is not one individual, it is not one group."

On Sunday, President George W. Bush addressed the nation, just hours after US planes launched off the decks of aircraft carriers.

"These carefully targeted actions are designed to disrupt the use of Afghanistan as a terrorist base of operations, and to attack the military capability of the Taliban regime," Bush said. "We are supported by the collective will of the world.

"More than two weeks ago, I gave Taliban leaders a series of clear and specific demands: Close terrorist training camps; hand over leaders of the al Qaeda network; and return all foreign nationals, including American citizens, unjustly detained in your country. None of these demands were met. And now the Taliban will pay a price. By destroying camps and disrupting communications, we will make it more difficult for the terror network to train new recruits and coordinate their evil plans," Bush continued. "At the same time, the oppressed people of Afghanistan will know the generosity of America and our allies. As we strike military targets, we'll also drop food, medicine and supplies to the starving and suffering men and women and children of Afghanistan."

homelessness. That fear, he said, encourages competition, which leads to hatred and crime.

After leading the audience through several meditative games designed to foster trust he explained to the audience the importance of cooperation.

"Global capitalism is causing the world to become more and more fragile," Maheshvarananda said.

"Therefore, society needs to develop an alternative paradigm based on cooperation and solidarity, and that alternative is PROUT."

According to him, PROUT would separate economies into three levels, administered by a combination of localized, national and global government.

In the PROUT system, citizens across the globe could start a small business under the ecological supervision of decentralized government Maheshvarananda said. If those businesses flourished, they could grow in scope to become cooperatives sharing both risks and profits, unlike modern corporations.

Maheshvarananda explained that national governments would run the few industries that produce goods and materials essential to society, like steel and electricity. The global government would regulate the international trade of goods, not money, and ensure a uniform bill of rights to all people.

At the end of the speech, Maheshvarananda instructed the audience to gather in a circle, hold hands, close their eyes, and repeat the mantra "give love a chance." After the presentation, Prahash Lauter, a longtime friend who taught PROUT to Maheshvarananda, led the audience in a series of stress reducing meditative and yoga exercises, including the "God Dance," in which the audience leapt across the carpeted floor and shook their bodies in sync with music.

Retaliation the only option

Offer some support

Retaliation is here. Right or wrong, good or bad, accept that. The world is a changing place, and sometimes those changes are ugly. War is always ugly.

It is OK to be angry if you do not agree with the U.S.'s policies with Afghanistan. But keep that anger in check, and don't forget the reason that the bombs are falling.

Remember that 5,600 American citizens who died in New York City. Remember the casualties of the U.S.S. Cole, the people who died in the first World Trade Center bombing and the victims that perished in the embassy bombings in Africa. Remember that more plans against American lives are most likely being made right now by the same group of individuals. Ask yourself why the United States should not make some sort of effort to confront the monsters that have messed with so many human lives.

America attacking locations in Afghanistan is not a flawless plan. To think that that no innocent lives will be shed in the raids is foolish, and to think that not one American soldier will die is the same. At some point, though, the positives in attacking outweigh the negatives. Taking no action after the mass murder of thousands of Americans is irresponsible, because it invites the mass murder of thousands more Americans in the future.

Take some relief in knowing that our American government has a heart. Even if the American military has an objective to accomplish, it is making the efforts to cushion the blows that it delivers indirectly to the Afghani people. C-17s are dropping care packages of food onto the Afghanistan streets to help give Afghans something to eat. A lot of people are in favor of turning the entire Afghanistan landscape into one large bomb crater, and the American government has the resources to work that way if it wanted to.

Instead, military forces are making every effort to reach out the innocents that get in the way. The solution isn't perfect. There's $320 million dollars in food and medical aid going toward Afghanistan, though, and if that is not enough to show that America understands that everyone in the country is not at fault, its hard to imagine what could.

Attacking Afghanistan is not a flawless decision. At this point, though, it may just be the only decision, because the terrorist attacks from that region of the world will just keep coming. Life is not perfect. Accept that, and rally behind our troops. It isn't their fault that the New York has been destroyed either.

New century, new solutions

SIMON PONGRATZ

If we as a society survive this new war that we all want so badly, we may be presented with the best chance that we've had for a long time to remake ourselves to be what we say we are. We've been using words like free, just and moral to describe ourselves, and these words give us strength. But how would we be described by those that we bomb and sanction on a regular basis?

Consider the highly controversial words of Sunera Thobani: "Do we feel any pain for the victims of U.S. aggression? Two hundred thousand people killed only in the initial war on Iraq. That bombing of Iraq has continued for 10 years now. Do we feel the pain of all the children in Iraq who are dying from the sanctions that were imposed by the United States? Do we feel that pain on an everyday level?" The answer is no, we do not. But we must. We must change, or be crushed under the weight of our lies.

It's getting more and more difficult for us to speak of freedom as we suspend our own in the name of safety. All these talks of national ID cards, soldiers in the cities and the airports, greater racial profiling, people held against their will and without explanation, increased wiretapping authority, digital ID cameras in public and midnight knocks at the door smack of Fascism.

There are some promising signs: in his rush to build an anti-terrorism coalition among the Arab states, President Bush last week spoke of his "vision of a Palestinian state," and there were reports that his security team was working on just such an idea. Sharon is hopping mad about it, but where the United States goes Israel must eventually follow, and he knows that.

That knowledge didn't stop Sharon from lashing out at the administration last Thursday, comparing their plans with the 1938 Munich Conference, effectively saying that the West was sacrificing Israel to appease the Arabs, as Britain and France had given Hitler the key to Czechoslovakia with Chamberlain's promise of "peace in our time."

Sharon has got it backwards. The Palestinians have for 50 years been living in refugee camps, oppressed citizens in their own country. They cannot be compared with Hitler and his cronies.

The alternative to the creation of a Palestinian state is continuing oppression, only now it will be backed by official US government policy. As I've stated before, this broad definition we're giving our 'enemies' is troubling, because after the obvious enemy, Al-Qaeda, is defeated, what then? Do we turn our guns on the Palestinians, the IRA, the Basque Separatist Movement, or any of the other various "terror" organizations?

As soon as the immediate threat to the United States is ended, scores of other countries will come to us, asking for help with their problems and reminding us of the NATO Treaty's Article 5 (an attack on one is an attack on all) and the help they gave us against Al-Qaeda. We're getting in over our heads.

Enough digression. My point is that we're finally talking about a responsible solution to the Palestinian problem, instead of giving the Israelis money to build walls.

The attacks against Afghanistan began on Sunday, with the usual rhetoric coming out of Washington. But this time it sounds different.

A Defense Department website read that "At the same time coalition forces are attacking the terror network, they will also airdrop food, medicine and relief supplies to the refugees within Afghanistan." President Bush also stated "We are the friends of almost a billion worldwide who practice the Islamic faith," and "The United States of America is an enemy of those who aid terrorists and of the barbaric criminals who profane a great religion by committing murder in its name."

These are the words of what I'm hoping is a new line of thinking in the way we apply our power: Not arrogantly, but tactfully. This administration hopefully understands that other actions are needed to offset the tragic consequences on the innocent, civilian populations that happen to live in countries that, for one reason or another, must feel our wrath. Offering humanitarian aid (assuming it actually gets to those who need it) and separating our enemies from other Muslims are promising starts.

"This administration hopefully understands that other actions are needed to offset the tragic consequences on the innocent, civilian populations that happen to live in countries that, for one reason or another, must feel our wrath."

Then comes the bad news. According to Bush, "This opening move in the campaign will clear the way for 'sustained, comprehensive and relentless operations to drive (terrorists) out and bring them to justice.'" Also, "In this conflict, there is no neutral ground." The first quote sounds a lot like the outdated 20th century tactics used in Iraq, and if the policy is at all the same, will also come with a disproportionate amount of innocent deaths. Not only will these methods fail, but they will quickly prove that we are also worthy of the term 'terrorist.'

The second quote means that the Pentagon is keeping open the possibility of a wider war with Iraq, Libya, Sudan, Somalia, anyone. Anyone who doesn't fall lockstep behind us in our quest for "infinite justice."

This proves that the arrogance of power has not been diminished by the events of Sept. 11th. Now that arrogance has been augmented by a desire for revenge—two notions that, when combined, can have disastrous results.

We have to start thinking along new lines, or this current crisis will snowball into something we cannot control. We can't stop the inevitable military action, but we can at least act the way a free, just, and moral society would act. Target the terrorists, minimize the collateral damage, fight with positive efforts instead of negative. It's a new century, and the new century demands new solutions to old problems. Perhaps if a successful effort is made to target only the Taliban and bin Laden, the sanctions against Iraq will be restructured or even ended. It would be a great note on which to begin what could be a free, just, moral, second American century.

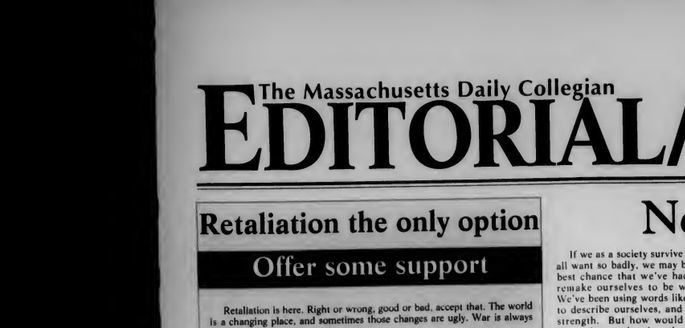
At Ground Zero

MATT BURSTEIN

Recently, I have read several editorials and heard people questioning American patriotism prior to the events of September 11, 2001. I've heard so much about how the American public seems to only show national unity in times of (or directly following a) crisis. The only response I have is that it just doesn't matter. I want all of those people to do me a favor and go into Manhattan as I recently did and follow this specific route.

I started at the front entrance of New York University's Tish Medical Center and walked down the road past the New York Coroner's office and the four huge refrigerated trucks waiting for bodies. I kept walking right past Bellevue hospital and its block-long wall covered in pictures of the missing and deceased, being careful not to step on the candles or the wilting flowers. From there I cut across Manhattan, passing a cop at every other corner, and missing person posters on every phone booth. Eventually I ended up at the World Trade Center.

At first I couldn't even believe what I was looking at, all those National Guardsmen, firefighters, ambulances and policemen. It was right out of a war movie. It was hard to believe that the ash that I was leaving footprints in and that was falling down on me was made of corpses, jet fuel, metal, glass and fire. I saw the firefighters and rescue workers changing shifts. I saw them walking covered in dust and debris, hanging out of fire truck windows, lying down on piles of boxes, washing their faces in the tents, all exhausted from a day of pulling out body parts and rummaging through tons of smoldering metal. I walked to an intersection where I could finally see ground zero from behind the police barricades a few blocks away.



The area doesn't even resemble the two towers which once stood there. Now, it is merely a twisted pile of constantly steaming metal that sucks the hope out of your soul. This was what death must feel like. After a few minutes you can't move, you can't hear anything and you can't feel anything: you just stare. I remembered seeing pictures of burned-out buildings where you could still see the frame of the building. The Twin Towers do not fall into this category. They are gone. No recognizable aspect of the Twin Towers remains. The area is just a pile of steel and cement, the final resting place for thousands of innocent Americans.

Walking back to the ferry to return home to New Jersey, I saw flags everywhere: in windows, hanging on buildings, stuck on cars, sewn onto backpacks and pinned onto clothing. The police and firefighters drive down the road and people cheer and clap and cry. Drivers get out of their trucks and let the police inspect without even the slightest interference. People are cordial and helpful. They ignore the traffic jams and the carpool rules, and they do their best to heal Manhattan.

I knew people who ran out after the tower they were working in was hit by a plane, friends who had the lobby doors in their buildings blown off by the explosion (who were just allowed to return to their homes) and wives with 7-month-old daughters who are now husband and fatherless. None of them cared about why people weren't wearing American flags, really listening to the national anthem, or giving blood three weeks ago. But they all noticed the stickers on the NFL helmets, the NYPD and FDNY hats the New York teams wore, the fact that for a while you could only give blood at certain places by appointment due to the overabundance of volunteers, the countless flags and pins adorning everybody's wardrobe, the candlelight vigils and all the other post-crisis patriotism. To say that the American public was not patriotic before the crisis matters little, and should have no part in any current debates.

If the victims I mentioned before feel better seeing people wearing flag pins, or in seeing John Franco pitch while wearing an FDNY hat, then the rest is inconsequential. Patriotism and the faith and hope that go along with it are above before and after and should be respected as such.

Fire at Delta Upsilon a harsh dose of reality

ELIZABETH PARISEAU

Sometimes I don't know if I'm cut out for this job.

When it comes time to defend your English degree (and you liberal Arts majors know what I'm talking about), "journalism" is a great answer. It implies a nine to five, respectable existence.

But sometimes it's anything but.

I was one of several reporters from the Collegian to report to the fraternity house fire on Friday. I have to admit that we joked as we headed over, not knowing what to expect. Even as we got closer our only concern was to see how close we could get, who we could talk with, what information we could absorb.

When we finally did get there we counted fire trucks, firefighters, police. We tried to approach them. We tried to get out from under the yellow tape. Finally we actually succeeded, and walked straight onto the lawn filled with the distraught and now homeless victims of this terrible event.

I suppose that may be some sort of coping mechanism, focusing in on details and scientific explanations so as to avoid the full horror of a tragedy. But the horror is still there after the who-what-when-and-why has been answered, and it's something that can't be explained or researched away.

I have to confess when I went over on to the lawn where the brothers were gathered, I tried to get them to answer questions. I have to admit I grumbled when they declined, and grumbled even louder when they shooed our photographer away.

I want to be a journalist, but there's something so barbaric about the things I did on Friday, as part of my job, that have stuck in my craw from the moment I walked back toward the office to finish the job and write the story. There's something inhuman about watching people's lives crumble away for a paycheck.

But there's one thing, though it's only one thing that I can think of to justify my actions on Friday. I thought of it while I was walking back to write, and struggling with my own conflicting emotions. I thought of the saturation of media after the Sept 11 tragedies, and the stark coverage they gave the explosions, collapses, suicidal leaps and clouds of ash and dust from the World Trade Center. I thought of the statistics, maps and pictures they've been running without mercy ever since. Barbaric. But, I realized, necessary.

Were it not for the news, the nation as a community would not be able to fully share in the tragedy that affects their neighbors. Were it not for images traumatic enough to bring onlookers right to ground zero, the kind of patriotic, emotional, and monetary outpouring we've seen bind our nation together since Sept 11 would not have been as widespread, pervasive and generous. People far away that you don't know are a statistic. Faces on a screen are human beings. Voices in print are human beings. That's what we're here to get across.

I still feel the need to extend my apology, not for the Collegian or for any of the other reporters or photographers on the scene that afternoon that kicked off Columbus Day weekend 2001 with tragedy instead of celebration, but for myself. I hate intruding into people's grief. I hate intruding into people's darkest hours, and I'm deeply sorry to have had to do it.

And, also for myself, I want to explain. For what it's worth, I feel strongly that the members of our campus community need to know what happened to our fellow students, and that they need to see it vividly. Like our nation, when we're faced with tragedy, we need to feel, react and then come together as one.

What was probably the worst day of my life could have been a lot worse. Thankfully, every member who resided at 778 North Pleasant Street at the Delta Upsilon Fraternity escaped unscathed. Most of us have lost everything we owned, but personal possessions are replaceable and lives are not. For this I am eternally grateful.

What began as one of the most promising semesters I have ever had suddenly went to Hell in a matter of minutes. The newspapers seem to be inaccurately reporting many aspects of Friday's accident, so I will set the record straight. I was one of the first to notice flames coming from a bedroom located on the first floor of the Delta Upsilon Chapter House, and one of the last ones to escape the house.

RICHARD GRAHAM

At around 2:00 p.m. on Friday, October 5, 2001, two other members and myself were repairing the house for the upcoming homecoming weekend. Our intentions were to have the house looking as good as it could look to impress our alumni. A fellow senior class member, Kevin Edwards, noticed that a smoke alarm was ringing in one of the first floor bedrooms. Upon opening the door, we saw that a very large fire had engulfed a couch and a bed. Smoke poured out of the room and into the hallway and the alarm went off. We grabbed a couple of fire extinguishers, but it was too late. The fire was totally out of control. I then ran upstairs to the second floor and told everyone who was there to get out because the house was on fire. Thirty seconds later, the smoke was so thick that I could not see daylight through the thick black smoke and had trouble finding the doorway to the outside.

Upon making it safely outside, I prayed that everyone else had gotten out and that nobody was sleeping or trapped inside. Twenty-three members lived in the house, but there were only 15 of us outside. Uncertainty was the only emotion that I had. I was unsure if everyone was all right and it was unquestionably the worst feeling I have ever had. I have known many of these guys since I was a freshman. These are my best friends who I could share anything with and I did not know where some of them were.

Reentering a house on fire is a huge mistake. I refused to go back in and urged others the same. There was only one person who came out after I did. It was my roommate Peter Cormier, who was about to get into the shower when I told him the news. We ran out together through the most awful smelling, thick, black smoke I have ever seen.

Watching the house that I have called home for two years burn down was such a tragic experience. I can only imagine how much worse the situation could have been had the fire occurred during a Friday night instead of during the daytime.

Though we have nothing left, we have each other and thankfully, our lives. It is our members that make up Delta Upsilon, not our house. We will rebuild, but unfortunately not during my time in college. Many of us will graduate this year, but our younger members will have the luxury of living in a brand new house that will be up to code and more fire resistant.

On behalf of the fraternity and myself, I would like to thank Delta Chi, Phi Mu Delta and Phi Sigma Kappa for offering our members rooms to live in during the semester. Thank you to Alpha Chi Omega, Iota Gamma Upsilon and Sigma Kappa sororities for your regards, food, beverages and clothing. Thank you to all of my friends who have offered to take me in as a roommate, who have cooked dinner for me and who have taken me to buy new clothing. It is a good feeling to know how many people really care about me, and I will never forget your acts of generosity.

A fire is as terrible a thing, as you could imagine. I hope students will learn from us. Fire safety is so important. Never ever make the mistake of believing that this could not happen to you. It can. Take safe precautions now so another even like this one does not happen again.

Richard Graham is an Executive Officer from the Delta Upsilon Fraternity.

The Soprano's Last Supper – full of fun, but where are these cannolis they are advertising?

By Shauna Billings

THE SOPRANO'S LAST SUPPER
Tremont Playhouse
October 5, 2001

There was one thing missing from Friday night's production of The Soprano's Last Supper. It wasn't government surveillance or mile-high hair, as both were present in abundance. No, as appalling as it may seem, there were no cannolis. There wasn't even any gelato or tiramisu.

What happened to the classic Godfather doctrine, "Leave the gun. Take the cannoli?" Sorry to dwell, but it just hurts – that piercing absence of ricotta-and-cream-cheesy goodness. Overlooking the serious lack of delectable pastry – The Soprano's Last Supper was a dinner-theatre success.

The evening took place downstairs at the Tremont Playhouse, past two doormen and down a narrow hall. It was all very backroom – setting the mood for a mobster bash. The Rizzo Brothers flirted with the ladies, while the FBI (complete with little moustaches) performed illegal searches down one older man's pants, and attacked a man who (Call the fashion police for backup!) wore sandals with his dress pants over a month after Labor Day (gasp!).

Suddenly, the lights dimmed, the music swelled, and out came Tony Baritone (Brian Rosenthal), the mob boss heading to the slammer for "spitzin' on the T" – which any Bostonian knows is an offense that is NEVER tolerated by the BPD or the MBTA rent-a-cops. So, with Baritone heading up the creek, the family (which by this point included the audience) came together to say goodbye to Tony, and to find a new boss for the family.

The Family's Administration and Associates – which included Vinnie the Hammer, Sonny and Lockjaw, raked the dinner in the front table. But Tommy Tones (Joe Noone) in white suit, black shirt and supporting role stole the show from upper level mobsters. And "The Coach" in a purple crushed velvet jacket and curly black wig was a favorite with the women. He handed his back-scratcher to the ladies to smack his backside with, but recoiled in horror when a large Irish boy gave him a whack. He proceeded to grab a severed leg and pummel him with it. Where was the FBI then I ask you?

Throughout dinner, cast members gave inspired singing performances and mingled with the guests – handing out money for the gambling tables and picking up women as they went. Lina "The Soprano" Cuisina, played by director Elaina Vrutsos, surprised the room when her Betty Boop voice changed to a smooth mezzo-soprano as she sang. However, she seemed a little uptight throughout the show – which one can only hope was because it was opening night. She did seem a little threatened by an audience member who got into his role when auditioning to be the next Godfather.

The best of the show were the wives and mob girls. Nonna ran around in a mantilla covering up ladies' bare shoulders and handing out tinfoil to wrap up leftovers in. Tootie and Filomena, in tight leopard print pants and foot-high hair, went around telling ladies about their tease-and-spray special going on in their Lynn hair salon. The girls instruct-

Kurt takes on Style

Style File
WITH SHAUNA BILLINGS
WITH KURT POLESKY

If you were expecting Style File by Shauna Billings, you came to the wrong place. Her Style File will return next week. For this week I will provide my perspective on several current fashion trends, while Shauna will provide hers on the world of television in Thursday's "Tube Notes." All of you hardcore Collegian readers know what that means. We are switching columns this week. As Shauna told me, "You never hear a guy's perspective on fashion." She told me, "Kurt, you are fashion plate, with your phat kicks and cool color combinations. You manage to combine the preppy look with some funky urban flavor that gives you credibility in both the hood and the country club. Tell me what you think about the world of male fashion, because I don't know anything about it." Well Shauna, here it goes.

Hair:

First off, why is it that so many guys have these fancy popstar haircuts? Most guys claim that they hate boybands, yet they style their hair like they are the sixth member of O-Town. Easy on the gel already.

Adidas:

One fashion trend that I do support is the massive proliferation of Adidas shoes. It seems like everyone is sporting the old school style Adidas "Superstar" shoes. They have a simple look: white with the trademark Adidas strip that comes in a variety of colors. If I ever become rich, you can be sure that besides giving all of my money to the poor, I will buy every color of Adidas shoes that are available, even the wacky ones like robin's egg blue and lime green. One word to anyone who doesn't own a pair of these shoes: Loser.

COURTESY ADIDAS

Shirts with numbers on them:

Walk around campus and it looks like there sure are alot of people on sports teams. You'll see people that are on the "AE Swimming" or "Abercrombie Weightlifting" teams. Personally, I am on a team called "The Cougars" that apparently play basketball in Southern California. I am number 11. Unfortunately, I am awful at basketball. I am both small and slow. (A Point Center if you will), which isn't the best combination. Until recently, I hadn't met any of my teammates. Then one day I saw a fellow teammate walking in the mall. The confusing thing was that he also was number 11, and so were a few other people that I ran into. Interesting.

Shirts with massive logos on them

Even though everybody makes fun of them, it seems like everybody has one of them: a shirt with a massive logo or company name on it. The system basically works like this: regular green shirt= $10, green shirt that has the massive phrase "Abercrombie" on its priceless (or $65.95). As I sit here, I am wearing a shirt that says "Eagle" and says something about surfing on "Sunset Beach." After all, what better way to dress than to be a walking advertisements for sweatshops.

Professor Outfits:

If you're looking for some inspiration in your dress, how bout copying your professors? Talk about a bunch that are stuck in a timewarp. Last year one of my professors -who shall remain nameless - wore one thing EVERYDAY: black shirt, and black pants. Examine your professor's wardrobe and you'll see everything from huge sweaters designed to hide massive guts to Hulk Hogan style hair cuts. Then there's the moustache. Put it this way, moustache = evil.

Shirts With Phrases:

In the spirit of the shirt with numbers on them comes shirts with phrases on them. "I'm easy" is probably my favorite. It's short and to the point. Most of the people I've seen wearing this shirt are guys. Of course, what guy isn't easy?

The Andre The Giant Strap

One female trend that seems to be gaining in popularity among the club sidewalk hoochie wear girls is the one strap dress, or the "Andre The Giant" strap as I refer to it. The late and kind of great wrestler Andre The Giant popularized this look with his one strap wrestling tights. Fashion inspiration sure comes from strange things.

Different Colors:

A few colors that seem to be gaining in popularity are lime green and baby blue (or is that robins egg blue?). Can't decide what color to

Emmys cancelled

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

In a move that speaks loudly to how seriously the entertainment industry is approaching the events surrounding the terrorist attacks on September 11, the Emmys were cancelled Sunday night for the first time in the 53-year history of the event.

According to a statement on the Emmys official website, the show was cancelled in light of the U.S. attacks against Afghanistan that began on the afternoon of October 7. The Emmys were previously postponed from their original September 16 airdate, and the recent cancellation was made under similar circumstances.

"We thought this is not the time to have a celebration, as much as we wanted to do it," said Jim Chabin, president of the Television Academy, in a statement. "There will be another time for another awards show."

A decision on when or if this year's Emmys broadcast will take place in the future has not been made, although one is expected by the end of the week.

The website states that security concerns did not weigh in on the Denzel Washington stars in Training Day.

Training Day gives a lesson on the streets

By Nick Pizzolato
Collegian Staff

TRAINING DAY
Directed by Antoine Fuqua
Playing at Cinemark Theaters

Within the first 20 minutes of Training Day we get a sense for the type of person that Detective Alonzo Harris (Denzel Washington) is.

Harris seems impartial to the rules of justice, rules that – being a 14-year veteran of L.A.P.D – he has sworn to uphold and serve by. Instead, he follows his own set of rules, pointing at his illustrious arrest record since his appointment to a special unit to fight and control drugs on the streets of inner city Los Angeles. His office is not in the closest precinct to his jurisdiction; instead his office is a 1978 jet-black Chevy Monte Carlo, complete with hydraulics, chrome and tinted windows. He pulls in front of a hangout of one of his many informants, to catch and scare three college kids riding in a 2000 VW Bug.

But more importantly, Harris forces rookie lake Hoyt (Ethan Hawke) into a nightmare of choices. Rid the streets of animals, who with every waking second seem to be dominating the city where his young wife and infant daughter live, or serve a detective whose "definition" of justice includes payoffs, shakedowns and fraternizing with the same people they are hired to bring in. Although the answer seems simple for the rookie cop, circumstance and environment dictate a tough and morally confusing day.

Training Day derives its names and situations from the headlines and "news briefs" of today while posing a serious question: what type of justice should there be? And at what price should it be attained? Filmed in actual drug infested sections of southern L.A., the film takes on the grittv realism of other classic inner-city films such as Boyz N' Tha Hood. Although the main characters are the police, the audience suddenly understands the mistrust and contempt that the "street" characters have for the men who are supposed to be arresting them.

Harris is not a happy man, at least not in the traditional sense. He seems to have no love for anyone outside his network circle of cops and criminals. Hoyt meets Harris for his first day at a coffee shop, and instead of Harris addressing him in a manner to make him feel at home and welcome as a part of his squad, Harris' conversation boils down to, "Shut up so I can read my paper." Hoyte, a young naive officer who has been part of the L.A.P.D. for 18 months, continues to try and make small talk, only to get utterly rejected, used, and forced to pay the bill even though he ordered no coffee or food.

We soon see that despite the fact that his actions might seem harsh and sometimes erratic, Alonzo knows the streets well. He no longer wears the standard detective gear, but drapes himself in silver chains, double body holsters and a long black leather jacket. Even his car fits into the streets, and as the next 20 minutes roll we see both Alonzo and Jake low-riding the streets of southern L.A., with Jake sticking out like a sore thumb and Alonzo actually cracking open beers between his chain-smoking.

Harris knows dealers, addicts, gang-bangers and informants at every street corner. He verbally harasses college students, who are out for an adventure, and physically punishes a junkie who not only tried to take out Hoyt but also raped a high school girl. He is on a first name basis with over half the deal-decision to cancel Sunday night's event. The election of appropriate-ness and the reluctance of some celebrities and undesirable attending guests also didn't feel appropriate about coming down here and participating.

"[The show] is small potatoes compared to what's going on out there in the world," Kounves said.

If the show had went on as expected viewers could have expected a different tone than previous broadcasts. The Emmys website states that the focus of the show was designed to be on unity above all, and organizers had asked attendees to not wear eye-grabbing outfits but rather "business attire."

Plans were also in place to air the program from the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles as well as portions from a Manhattan studio. A tribute to "heroes and victims of the attacks" was also scheduled according to the website. Ellen Degeneres was in place to host the event.

Sensitivity towards the terrorist attack on September 11 has been felt throughout all forms of art and entertainment. Songs with lyrics or themes that may be upsetting in light of the attacks have been removed from radio stations. Several movies have been delayed indefinitely, or are currently in the process of being reworked to avoid any inflammatory material. Entire seasons of television programs have been put on hold, while others have been altered to remove potentially offensive content. Bill Maher, host of "Politically Incorrect," was widely denounced for comments about the terrorist attack that he made on the program.

A handful of Emmys were given out prior to the cancellation of the event, including one for "Best Commercial" as well as acting awards.

Ethan Hawke deals with his conscience in Training Day.

ers and gang members in the city, and has no qualms about opening fire in a neighborhood, or any other questionable police methods just as long as he gets what he needs. And if there is one thing the audience learns in the two hours of Training Day, it is that Alonzo Harris always gets what he needs.

Jake Hoyt isn't just the traditional protagonist; he is also in some ways the cliche that we expect when dealing with the antagonist in a film such as this. He and Harris work right beside one another, so neither of them can pick that one is oranges and the other is apples.

Hoyt may seem like a soft rookie – apparently unable to defend the streets or defend himself – but in fact, he can and will defend himself when needed. The audience sees Hoyt taking on the methods of the senior officer, because he knows they are wrong.

Despite all the talk by Harris that not everything is black and white, but a whole lot of gray, Hoyt sees the truth amidst lies and corruption. He will not back down from his morals, and he will not inflict his definition of justice, with that of the methods of the jaded detective.

But beyond the enormously deep and complex characters of the film, Training Day shows signs of the new up-coming genre of film shown in films like The Bad Lieutenant and Copland, in which police officers are so deeply involved in the details of their job that it becomes part of their everyday lives. They may have resisted initially but the lines that their lives and the lives of those whom they are supposed to bring to justice have become so blurred that only they can tell where and if they should stop.

Training Day is directed by Antoine Fuqua, whose earlier work has included the action/comedy Bait, the visually stunning action film The Replacement Killers and also music videos, including the video for Coolio's Gangsta's Paradise. He gives the audience information on why it should dislike Harris, and in all truth it should – he is a bad, corrupt cop, but at the same time he plays Harris off for most of the film as just being jaded and concerned for Hoyt.

Does he want to set Hoyt up, or does he want to see if Hoyt has what it takes to succeed him? By the time the film concludes, his motivations are clear to both Hoyt and the audience, but throughout the film we have to question his acts while we are amazed at not only his rapport with the streets but also his previous record.

The style of the movie is rough and raw, placing the audience in some of the most dangerous parts of the legendary South Central Los Angeles. Fuqua recruited actual gang members to add to the realism of the streets, and acquired permission from the communities of some of the most notoriously dangerous areas to actually film there.

Fuqua has been quoted as making this film into a story much like that of Francis Ford Coppola's masterpiece Apocalypse Now – showing the transformation from a heart of gold to a heart of darkness. The film also shows what happens to the people who enter this dangerous section of America under the dangerous circumstances of undercover police work.

Fuqua's vision and realism is added to the gritty words of screenwriter David Ayer (U-571). Ayer, who grew up in the South Central Los Angeles, began working on this film in 1995 during some of the most dangerous and violent events in that area's history. His tale of corruption and the blackening of a soul resonates thanks to Fuqua's use of shadows and genuine care for the film, which reacts to a subject that both director and writer feel is important in today's headlines.

Training Day is powered by a fantastic script and a gifted director. Fuqua's talents have been over-looked by his last two cinematic endeavors (neither of which was backed by such star power or such seriousness by the studio). Although some scenes stick out in the minds of moviegoers, both movies are for the most part very forgettable.

However, Training Day is a stylistic depiction of corruption of the soul and of a person. It's a classic tale of good and evil, and Fuqua's vision is as sharp and clear as John Singleton's was with Boyz N' Tha Hood.

The film also incorporates fantastic performances by Ethan Hawke and Denzel Washington. Washington is a genius in portraying a character so villainous and different from characters he has played in the past. If you don't think he can be a successful bad guy, then you must see this film. His demeanor is unlike anything he has demonstrated before.

Training Day is a tour de force, incorporating suspense, fantastic dramatic performances and a new vision of the streets and the law. Without a doubt, this is one of the best movies of the year, and a milestone for everyone involved in making it.

ed the room how to be a true mob girl and gave advice including the most important accessory a girl could have – gum. After teaching the difficult talent of chewing and strutting, as well as a lesson on how to get your hair bigger ("'cause every girl knows that bigger is better"), the ladies busted into a rendition of "Respect" – what every mob doll really needs.

The food was fantastic – catered by La Famiglia Giorgios Catering – but as I said before, all the pesto, lasagna and cacciatore in the world can't make up for the lack of a cannoli.

There were a few glitches and down times throughout the performance, and the gambling tables were open for all of five minutes. But the show is sure to work out those minor problems by its next performance. The key to a good show is audience participation. The crazier you are, the more fun you'll have, so if you go, let loose – and grab "The Coach" for a spin on the dance floor.

The Soprano's Last Supper plays November 11 and December 7, 14 & 21 at the Tremont Playhouse, 275 Tremont Street, Boston. Tickets are $49 a person, and include dinner, dancing, show and "laundered money." For tickets call 1-800-944-5639.

UMass X-ed out in opener

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Even in the world of hockey, superheroes reign supreme.

The Massachusetts hockey team was sluggish out of the gates in its first and only exhibition game of the 2001-02 season, and visiting St. Francis Xavier (Nova Scotia, Canada) used four first period goals to propel it to a 5-3 victory Saturday night.

Guy Loranger scored a hat trick off of Patrick Grandmaitre to lead the X-Men, who tallied three goals on the man advantage in the contest.

"Three of [the goals] came on the power play and we haven't had too much time to work on our penalty killing yet, so that was pretty clear that [the goals] were breakdowns that they capitalized on," said UMass senior defenseman Toni Söderholm.

Freshman Matt Walsh and sophomores Thomas Pöck and Scott Horvath scored for the Minutemen, as eight different players, including three freshmen, tallied points on the evening.

"There were some parts of the game [that went well], given that we've only been on the ice six days," said head coach Don Cahoon. "We moved the puck pretty well, we attacked OK – we didn't finish, but we attacked OK. We were really loose defensively – we couldn't kill penalties, and we have to tighten things up along those lines. It was a good exercise for us – nothing more, nothing less."

Tim Warner started in net for the first time in his college career, and made 10 saves on the night, many of them late in the game in pressure situations.

"I thought he played like everyone else – I thought he had jitters in the first period, he was a little too nervous," Söderholm said. "He settled in nicely after the first period and made some nice saves."

Loranger got the scoring going at the 4:58 mark of the first as he took a pass from Grandmaitre in deep and flicked the puck into the shelf, as the Maroon and White got caught in a poor shorthanded line change.

Just 26 seconds later UMass tied the score, as freshman Greg Mauldin got the puck on the left side and passed a strike to Walsh, who promptly fired a one-timer through the pads of starting netminder David Haun.

St. Francis scored its second power play goal of the night at 8:07, as Dustin Russell took a pass from Grandmaitre in the slot and put the puck past the helpless Warner to make the score 2-1. The X-Men extended their lead at the 10:55 mark, when a turnover in the far corner sprung Alan Dwyer, who used some fancy stickwork to beat Warner down low.

The Minutemen again clawed their way to a one-goal deficit 16:14 into the period. Tim Turner brought the puck over the blue line and fired a shot that was blocked into the right corner. But Turner followed the puck, skated free and found Pöck in the slot, who then buried the puck to the high glove side.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Thomas Pock had a goal in UMass' 5-3, exhibition game loss to St. Francis on Saturday.

With 2:33 to go in the opening period, the Minutemen found themselves down two men, as Horvath was called for cross-checking and junior Sami Jalkanen was rung up for a slash. Just 18 seconds into the penalty, a shot by Grandmaitre hit the side of the net, where Russell was denied on the rebound, but the puck squirted to a wide-open Loranger, who gave St. Francis a 4-2 lead.

"In the first period we were too much all over the place in our defensive zone but we tightened up a little defensively as we got along and got the jitters out," Söderholm said. "We have some work to do in the defensive zone, but without a game like this, you're not going to know about it until you see it on the ice in a real game."

The second period saw the teams tighten up significantly on defense, with both teams dishing out a number of heavy hits, including two monstrous checks by junior defenseman Randy Drohan. The only scoring in the period came on the tail end of a UMass power play, as freshman Justin Rafferty skated up the left side and split the defense on a crossing pass to Horvath, who stuffed the puck home.

The Minutemen had numerous attempts to tie the game in the third period, including a one-time attempt by Rafferty with 12 minutes left that just missed the top right corner, but afterward, Haun robbed Horvath of a seemingly sure goal.

But with 9:43 to go, the X-Men posted their fifth goal of the game as Loranger completed his hat trick, taking a pass from Grandmaitre on the right side for a wide-open goal.

"It's tough playing defensively when you haven't played in so long," Kuiper said. "You have to communicate well with your partners. It happens so much faster than in practice that sometimes you don't react as quickly as you'd like because you haven't been in that situation for a while."

But according to Söderholm, what the team lacked in results, it made up for in cohesion.

"It was a good chance to get everyone some ice time. In that sense, I think it brought us together a lot too," Soderholm said.

With the season opener set to roll this Saturday against Niagara, the penalty kill and power play will be the focus of this week's practices.

"The special teams need a lot of work," Cahoon said. "I'm happy with some of the skill level we have – I think the puck moved pretty well and that could bode well for special teams in the future. We're going to have to dedicate a lot of time to special teams because that was the breakdown tonight."

O'Quinn kept Fordham scoreless in the opening game of the weekend last Friday. After a 34-minute delay due to a fire at a local fraternity house, UMass welcomed the Rams to their home field. John Lytton put up the only goal of the game after 29 minutes of play, taking a pass from Morales and lighting up the scoreboard. The goal was the first of the junior back's career.

The Minutemen continued to put pressure on both the offense and defense of the Rams throughout the game. The Maroon and White failed to net another goal but kept the Rams from a chance to even the score.

"They're [Fordham, LaSalle] not the top, but they can still beat you," head coach Sam Koch said. "Fordham could have beat us, and LaSalle had some chances."

Junior forward Jeff Deren has been quiet on the field lately, not scoring or assisting this weekend. Deren is the leading scorer for the Minutemen and has been heavily marked by the competitors. Koch said that UMass soccer fans "don't have to worry about him."

"He'll be there. He'll be scoring," Koch said of Deren.

The winning home stand this weekend moves the Minutemen to 6-3 for the season and 2-1 in the A-10 conference. UMass now sits in the fourth seat of the conference, three points behind rival Rhode Island (3-0-A-10). The Maroon and White still has eight conference games to play in the closing four weeks of the season. UMass is looking to leave a mark by pushing through to the post-season.

"We've got to focus on the road ahead. It will be difficult," Koch said. "We've got tough games ahead."

Koch's team will face off against another conference team this weekend when it will travel to Olean, NY to meet up with St. Bonaventure. The Bonnies sit on the same A-10 record as the Minutemen, with a 2-1 record in the conference.

"You can't worry where you are until the end," Koch said.

The Minutemen will meet up in New York with St. Bonaventure on Friday at 3 p.m. managed to take the lead at 29-30. After a Matton kill to knot the teams up at thirty, an attempted kill by the Rams' Roxanne Hill appeared to sail wide, but was ruled in bounds to give the visitors the lead and eventually the game, as Fordham went up two games to one.

UMass battled back in game four, picking apart the Fordham attack and forcing it into several errors as the Maroon and White again tied up the match with a 30-22 victory. Senior Lauren Vander Veen led the way in the fourth slate, slamming home seven kills for the Minutewomen. The fifth game had the same result, as the home squad took the lead and never relinquished it and DeMarte's team-leading 17th kill put the exclamation point on another UMass victory.

"It really shouldn't have been that close," said Kenny. "I just give Fordham's defense a lot of credit."

Saturday night, however, the Minutewomen came to play as they swept through a young and inexperienced George Washington squad, 3-0. The Colonials, starting a lineup of three freshmen and three sophomores were clearly outmatched by the UMass lineup filled with three seniors, and were outplayed throughout the contest, as the Maroon and White won 30-25, 30-23, 30-22.

"It's very, very hard to win in this conference with freshmen and sophomores," said Kenny. "But they'll be good. They'll be better the next time we play them."

The defending conference champion could never put together any semblance of an extended offensive attack, as the Minutewomen had the lead for the vast majority of the match. George Washington never took more than a two-point lead early in the first game, and the Minutewomen led from start to finish in games two and three.

DeMarte again led the way for the Minutewomen, slamming home 13 kills in the victory. Nitia Small added 11, and junior Clare Baxter came off the bench to chip in with 10 kills on the match. Jitka Stehnova was very efficient at the setter position, contributing 38 assists for the UMass offensive attack. Kenny was very pleased with her play, mentioning that she was much more effective in her set distribution.

After Friday night's debacle Kenny was extremely happy in her team's play, as the Minutewomen improved their record to 3-3 in conference play and 8-5 overall.

"I can't remember the last time we were in control of a conference match from start to finish," said Kenny.

The Minutewomen look to extend its winning streak to three matches today as they continue their Atlantic 10 season in Kingston, R.I. against the Rhode Island Rams. URI comes into the match with an 8-7 record overall, but the team is currently in first place in the Atlantic 10 at 5-1. The Rams have won eight of their last nine matches and five in a row, so the Maroon and White will have a tough task ahead in order to keep pace in conference play.

Minutewomen a 1-0 lead that they were able to hold on to.

Once again it was a set piece that created the decisive opening as Martha Conover's well-struck free kick found sophomore Michelle Luttati whose shot was saved by LaSalle goalie Kaitlin Glass. However, Glass was unable to control the rebound and Jones snuck in to put the ball home and give UMass the lead.

The Maroon and White nearly doubled that lead just minutes later, as Erin Lilly took a feed from fellow striker Stephanie Santos and fired a shot that beat Glass in the LaSalle net but not the post. This was the second time on the afternoon that Glass had been beaten only to be saved by her post.

The Minutewomen handily outshot the Explorers 14-6, 2-1 A-10, 13-7 but only forced Glass to make two saves while Podhrasky stopped five shots in the UMass net.

The Minutewomen return to action on Friday afternoon when they take on A-10 rivals St. Bonaventure at Totman Field.

Unfortunately for the Massachusetts field hockey team, there was no nuclear-powered DeLorean in which to make an 88 mph jet away from Syracuse's Coyne Field on Saturday afternoon. With no time left on the game clock, Syracuse's Joanne Lombard scored on her team's twelfth penalty corner to propel the No. 19 Orangewomen to a 2-1 victory.

The decisive goal came after UMass squandered a prime scoring chance of its own with 30 seconds left, instead allowing SU's Michelle Aronowicz to dribble the length of the field and earn the fateful corner.

"Losing like that really sucks the life out of you," said senior co-captain Jill Fantasia. "We should have been taking that corner to win it, and instead we're in our own end watching them take it."

The Minutewomen (3-6) held a 1-0 advantage from the 5:55 mark of the first half, when junior Stacey Blue put home her second goal of the season. Lombard locked the score with her first career goal on a penalty corner with 12:38 to go in the second half, then sent UMass packing with her game-winner.

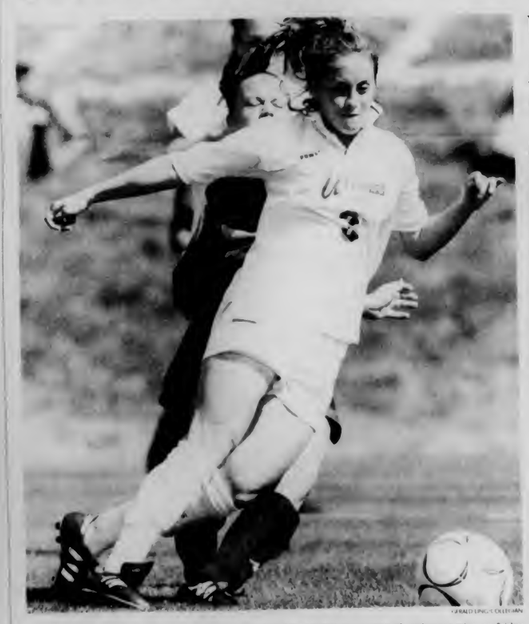
Syracuse (8-2) squandered a chance to tie the game on a penalty stroke a mere 6:31 into the second half, but midfielder Kristin Aronowicz hit the left post with her shot. The junior earned the stroke when she and Fantasia got wrapped up while fighting for a loose ball on a blocked SU corner.

"That should have been either another penalty corner or a 16-yard hit out for us, but definitely not a stroke," Fantasia said. "Neither of us could go anywhere with it, but Ashley was still right there. It's not like I stopped [Aronowicz] from scoring."

The Maroon and White stepped up its attack in the game's final minutes, but Syracuse goalkeeper Audrey Lasko denied shots by Minutewomen Erika Whiston and Heather Kenney. Both teams received strong play from the goalie position, where Lasko and UMass's Ashley Egland notched eight saves apiece.

"Ashley is playing great, and I think the whole defense is starting to trust her more," said UMass sweeper Anke Bruemmer. "When teams shoot on us now, I'm not expecting the worst; I'm just expecting her to get it and I'm looking for the rebound."

Despite enjoying a 12-3 penalty corner advantage, SU managed only three more shots (14-11) than UMass. It was the third-straight game in which the Minutewomen have reached double digits in shots but given up at least 10 penalty corners as well.



"We just need to be more patient and not let teams get inside on us as much," Bruemmer said of her team's penchant for surrendering corners. "Our aggression is coming at the wrong times, when we need to remember that Ashley is behind us."

Bruemmer chalked up the decisive goal Saturday to a Maroon and White mental lapse in regards to time management.

"With 30 seconds left, we should know to stop them outside the 25 and play against the clock," Bruemmer said.

The Minutewomen will now experience a sort of homecoming, as they host Providence on Wednesday in only their second home game of the season. The opening pass-back for that contest is scheduled for 3:30 pm.

One of the distinguishing marks between a good team and an average team is record in one-goal games. Average teams fold under the pressure and end up on the losing end of such matches, while good teams somehow find a way to win. The Massachusetts women's soccer team is beginning to show signs that it falls in the latter of the two categories.

For the second consecutive year, the Minutewomen won a pair of one-goal games against Atlantic 10 foes Fordham and LaSalle. UMass defeated Fordham 2-1 in a rough and tumble encounter on Friday afternoon before heading to Philadelphia on Sunday to knock off LaSalle 1-0 in an equally tight match.

Freshman Carly Turman scored the eventual game winning goal, her second of the season, midway through the second half of Friday's match with the Rams. The Minutewomen's strength on set pieces proved paramount as senior Brooke Bartlett swung in a corner kick to the back post where Turman one-timed a volley past Fordham keeper Shannon Misiaszek to give the Minutewomen the lead for good. Turman, a reserve midfielder from Pleasant Hill, Calif. has now scored on each of her two collegiate shots.

"It definitely helped my confidence going in and getting the winning goal," said Turman. "I had been playing just the last 15 minutes of games lately and it's hard coming in as a freshman but I'm doing well with it."

Despite carrying most of the possession for the majority of the match UMass (6-2, 3-0 A-10) was out shot 11-8 by the Rams. However, it was the Minutewomen who would score first as senior midfielder Kat Machmer tallied her first goal of the season in the 12th minute to give UMass a 1-0 lead. Junior Alexi Rudd took a pass from Andrea Trujillo and hit a cross to the back post that found Machmer, whose diving header eluded Misiaszek and wound up in the Ram net.

The lead was short lived, however, as Fordham (5-4, 0-3 A-10) equalized just more than eight minutes later through freshman Elena Daragiati. Daragiati received a cross from Kirsten Gellatly 10 yards from goal and slotted a shot past UMass goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky for her second goal of the season.

Fordham was forced to play part of the second half without its second leading scorer, freshman forward Jackie Aines. Aines, who had picked up a yellow card earlier for clashing with UMass defender Maggie LaBrode, was forced to leave the game with an apparently serious leg injury.

Two days later the Minutewomen were back in action with the opponent this time the Explorers of LaSalle. Last season Martha Conover scored late on to give the Minutewomen a 2-1 victory in Amherst and this year it would be another midfielder that cast the deciding blow with Conover once again playing a vital role.

Senior Katelyn Jones scored her second goal of the season and fifth career game-winner in the 67th minute to give the

Two different volleyball teams donned the Maroon and White this weekend at Curry Hicks Cage. On Saturday night, the Massachusetts volleyball team came to play, as it thoroughly dominated its conference foe. The previous night, however, the Minutewomen's evil twin committed numerous hitting errors and had decisions as UMass played its worst match of the season.

Luckily the mediocre performance didn't prevent the Minutewomen from emerging victorious as they defeated Fordham 3-2. UMass struggled throughout the match, but buckled down in the fourth and fifth games to put the pesky Rams out to pasture.

"It was a very poorly played match on our part," said Head Coach Bonnie Kenny. "I don't think we've ever hit that badly in a match."

UMass ended with a hitting percentage of .204 for the match, but only because of a well-played second game in which its percentage was an extremely high .432, and a final stretch in which the Minutewomen finally got their act together and started playing solid volleyball.

The Maroon and White also went with a revamped lineup due to personal tragedies affecting several team members. Freshmen Carol Mattos and Amanda Thomas both saw their first extended action of the season, and neither of them seemed to show any freshman jitters. Mattos finished the match with 13 kills and contributed 11 digs on defense, while Thomas filled in admirably at the setter position, ending the contest with 26 assists.

Kenny said that playing the two newcomers was definitely not in the team's game plan, but she thought that they stepped up well in place of her more experienced players.

"I thought Carol came ready to play, and when you play hard, good things happen," said Kenny. "Amanda did a good job coming off the bench [as well]."

After the Minutewomen got off to a rocky start in game one – hitting for an atrocious -.051 percentage in dropping the game 23-30 – they rebounded in game two to lock the match at one apiece. The Maroon and White held a slim 10-8 lead, but the home team went on several extended rallies to stake themselves to a 24-14 lead. The Rams never got closer than seven points for the rest of the game, and a Lymaric Llovet kill gave the home team a 30-22 win and deadlocked the two teams at one going into the break.

Coming out of the locker room the two teams battled in a tightly contested third game in which neither team could muster more than a two-point lead early on. UMass went up 25-19 after a Janeen DeMarte kill and appeared to be well on its way to taking a 2-1 lead. However, Fordham stuck around and even

The Massachusetts men's soccer team celebrated the holiday weekend in style, shutting out two conference teams at Totman Field. UMass overcame Fordham 1-0 in Friday's opener and closed out with a 3-0 victory over LaSalle on Sunday.

The last 20 minutes of the game against LaSalle proved that the Minutemen could dominate all around the field, with two goals scored to advance UMass' lead 3-0. Junior midfielder Andrew Eicher shot at a wide-open net after receiving the ball from forward Yuri Morales. Eicher netted the goal past the sleeping LaSalle keeper who looked over his shoulder in awe as the black and white slipped past him.

Freshman forward Brent Plumley wrote the final score netting one in the top corner of the net just 11 minutes after Eicher's goal. Plumley's goal was the first of his career as a Minuteman. The Atlantic 10 Conference named Plumley as "Rookie of the Week" after his ninth game with time on the pitch.

Just three minutes into the game the Minutemen had the first and winning goal in their match against LaSalle Sunday. Ptah Myers, a sophomore forward, woke up the Explorers by putting one past their goalkeeper in a give-and-go play with Morales. The early lead kept the Minutemen dominating through the first half. While UMass was able to keep the ball in scoring position, the team failed to put up another number on the scoreboard for the remaining 41 minutes of play during the first half.

The second half against LaSalle proved to be a more closely played frame with the Explorers exerting some pressure on netminder Bryan O'Quinn. The challenging team was able to put a couple shots on the veteran, but O'Quinn only had to make one save to keep LaSalle in check. O'Quinn had an incredible weekend in the box with two shutouts, both A-10 conference matches.

O'Quinn's ability to keep LaSalle scoreless moves the Gk into second place all time for UMass career blanks. O'Quinn has kept four of the last five competitors scoreless, totaling 13 in his career at UMass. The keeper is just two shutouts behind the school record held by Sam Ginzburg (1985-88).

New Africa House hosts hoop dancer

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Cindy Naughton, an employee of the Smith Campus School, teaches a course on Native American music. Each semester she shows her students a video featuring traditional dances.

When Naughton learned that Cliff Matias, an award-winning Native American performer, would be demonstrating Hoop Dancing at the New Africa House's Augusta Savage Gallery, she jumped at the chance to witness one of her favorite dances live.

Last night, she and her son Tom joined a capacity crowd at the Gallery to watch Matias and his partner, Jason Gullo, perform both traditional and contemporary rituals.

Matias and Gullo, educators with New York City-based Lotus Music and Dance, began their performance by explaining that the traditions in which they were participating were not specific to any Indian ethnicity.

"We're sharing with you contemporary Native American dance," said Matias. "There's no real nation it would come from."

He explained that there are common elements to nearly all Native American dances, such as drumming.

"The drum represents the earth, our great mother," Matias said. "The beating of a drum sounds like the beating of a heart."

He demonstrated typical drumbeats, all of which imitated heartbeats. He then broke into an aggressive, war-like thumping familiar to all in the audience from countless Westerns and cartoons.

"This means nothing to us," said Matias. "Whose heartbeat sounds like this? If your heartbeat sounds like this, I know a really good cardiologist for you."

Matias and Gullo picked volunteers from the audience, who participated in common, social dances such as the Smoke Dance, and the Buffalo Dance. At one point, Matias asked for a female volunteer "without a boyfriend", and played a traditional love song for her on a Native American flute.

The finale of the evening was the "Hoop Dance", in which Matias danced with five multi-colored hoops, forming intricate patterns in the shapes of various animals, including birds, snakes and mice.

"There aren't a lot of dancers who tell stories with their hoops today," he said. "There are maybe 300 of us."

Matias's performance was met with enthusiastic applause from the crowd.

"I loved how Cliff incorporated his personal experience with the universal Native American experience," said Amy Corey, the Augusta Savage Gallery Manager. "He related to the audience in a way that everyone seemed to enjoy."

Matias says that he hopes that attendees of his performances "get a better understanding of Native American culture and music.

"We don't do a lot of history – we concentrate on culture," he said. "Maybe we can break some stereotypes."

Naughton, who said she enjoyed the show immensely, hopes that Matias and Gullo's lesson is not lost on her son.

"I hope he gets an appreciation for this wonderful art form," she said. "I hope [this performance] counters some of the stereotypical 'bad guy' images of Native Americans that he might get from other sources."

Cliff Matias brought Native American dancing to the New Africa House in a program that educated as well as entertained with the customs of Native Americans.

University administrators to speak at SGA meeting

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Tonight's meeting of the Student Government Association Senate will feature the presence of several guest University Administrators.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin, Director of Housing Services Michael Gilbert and Director of Parking Services Michael Brennan are among those invited to come and speak to the Senate.

Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders explained that having these guests come and speak to the Senate would allow the administrators to explain their roles within the University of Massachusetts.

"I've spoken with Michael Gilbert, who is receptive and more than willing to talk to people," Saunders said. "I don't want to see Senators jumping down their throats about issues, but for this to serve as informational in regards to what they do. As for issues themselves, they can't be expected to answer them all during announcements. That's why we're [also] setting up meetings with administrators outside of the Senate."

Saunders said that this is an opportunity for Senators to meet and get involved with these administrators.

In cooperation with University administrators, SGA members have been looking into other areas they form motions to present to the Senate. One motion on the agenda urges the administration to look at the University budget and correct its imbalances. The motion is asking the administration to look at the funding being put into athletics versus academics and to shift the "imbalanced" budget to a more equitable system.

"We spend a lot more of a percentage of money on athletics, and when a senior can't get into a class we need to look into why this is occurring," Saunders said. "This motion is simply asking administrators to re-evaluate the Universities priorities."

Senate members have also been working to get involved with the possible room and board fee increases that may occur in the future.

Associate Speaker Bill Powers, Secretary of University Policy Jen Casavant and Senator Dan Saunders met with Vice Chancellor of Finance Paul Page, Director of Dining Services Ken Toong and Gilbert in an effort to review future fee increases.

"We know there will be fee increases in order for [administrators] to keep up to their quality of performance," Powers said. "But we have questions of whether the fee increase in these services is worth the cost. Our main concern is that room and board stay affordable for students."

Saunders also commented on the possibilities of future fee increases by explaining that the University needs to look at what funding is really necessary.

"This is an ongoing debate. There has been a [string] of increases of over 13 percent in the past four years," Saunders said. "Take the video cameras, for instance. There is no proof of their asset to this campus – if anything, you feel as though you're being watched. If Housing is going to sell a nine percent increase to students, they are responsible to look into their own organization as well."

Members of the Senate will address residential life, funding and other issues at their weekly meeting at 7 p.m. this evening in Campus Center room 168 C.

Seminar series to kick off

Bio-warfare to be discussed today

Due to the success of last week's seminar on counter terrorism, Math professor Melvyn Berger will be the discussant of a series of seminars beginning today at 2:00 p.m. in the Lederle Graduate Research Tower, room 1634. Today's seminar will focus on the topic of bio-warfare.

Speakers in the upcoming seminars will include faculty members and students. Today's presentation will be made by Health Policy and Management professor, Seth Goldsmith, who is an expert on anthrax and smallpox. According to Berger, students will be giving a lecture about computer viruses in a few weeks.

All faculty and students are welcome to join in the forum, and to contribute thoughts and suggestions on the war against terrorism. "We want to have a constructive attitude," Berger said. "[We're] not just going to lie down and accept what they're going to do."

Science education valuable in the "new economy" says recent survey

By Tom Ollila
Collegian Correspondent

Recent trends suggest significant changes in the workplace, according to a survey commissioned by Bayer Corporation in cooperation with the National Science Foundation.

The survey found an increased dependence on "New Economy" skills, even in "Old Economy" jobs. "New Economy" skills consist of greater adaptability in facing a range of problems while "Old Economy" skills focus on working hard.

When the survey asked new employees and their managers to select between two skills, the answers clearly demonstrated the workplace shift. The results showed that employees should adapt to work place changes, work best in teams and continually expand their skills as the company changes.

The survey found a strong need for increased science education. According to Rebecca Lacore, executive director of Bayer Foundation, "This survey's findings that today's workplace values problem-solving, critical-thinking and team working reinforces the conclusion that students need to learn science in the kind of experiential, hands-on way that helps to develop these 'working smart' skills."

Responding to this, the majority of both new employees and their managers agreed that science should be learned through a "hands-on curriculum." Both also felt science should receive equal or greater treatment as other subjects at the elementary school level.

Agreeing with an increased need for science education at an early age, Joan M. Stoia, Director of the Campus Career Network, said, "There's not enough emphasis on science and technology...there needs to be more of a balance." She also explained that many technologically related skills need a strong elementary through high school background and cannot just be taught in college.

Stoia also gave a good background on the economy change. She explained that there was a strong manual to intellectual shift in the early 80s, which led to a good job market for recent college graduates. Likewise, from 1992 until 2000, the economic boom greatly heightened the market, especially for technology majors.

However, since July, the markets have been going down. While the boom seems to have diminished, Stoia emphasized that while there was an "easier time for getting jobs prior to July 2001...the pervasive nature of the new economy makes science and technology knowledge very useful for getting jobs in today's economy." She also explained that while new jobs may not be as available through "expansion," they will continue to be out there through "replacement."

She offered some optimistic news dealing with Biology-related majors. "Especially in Massachusetts," she said, "Job seekers will still find demand in the Biotechnology market."

Another useful point Stoia made was her emphasis on "passion," not just knowledge, when she said, "Don't major in something you don't love and never try to time your major according to business cycles...they change every 18 months to three years."

Offering her insight on the survey, Laura Howard, Deputy

LBGT lecture series at Stonewall

By Elizabeth Pariseau
Collegian Staff

The Stonewall Center has recently announced that it will be sponsoring a Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay and Transgender lecture series throughout the fall semester. These lectures, according to Stephen Pereira of the Stonewall Center, have been a weekly event on campus for about the past five years. They will deal with various contemporary issues facing the LGBT community.

On Friday, Oct. 19, Chantal Nadeau, a professor of Communication Studies at Concordia University in Montreal, will deliver a lecture entitled, "The Sexual Borders of a Nationalist Agenda: Bill 32 and Same-Sex Partnership In Quebec," on same-sex partnership rights. The talk will relate this issue to the wider issues facing the nation.

"I don't know what the bill is exactly," Pereira said when reached for comment. "As far as I'm aware, Quebec has had in the works...domestic partnerships like same-sex unions...this lecture will explore what this means" to the LGBT community.

Pereira said that issues such as the bill being "something like marriage...shoots some activists in the foot because they don't want to have the same type of relationships as straight people." These issues will be covered in the lecture at 12:30 p.m. It will take place in Tobin Hall in room 422.

On Thursday, Oct. 25, Lisa Walker, a professor of English and Women's Studies at the University of Southern Maine, will present a lecture entitled "Lesbian Pulp in Black and White." The presentation will explore the history of femme lesbian archives.

Pereira explained that "in some circles there are identities called femme or butch that refer to the gender appearance of the individual. Femme would be more of a girly type, not your stereotypical lesbian, also called a "lipstick lesbian."

Walker's lecture "will introduce paradigms of racial invisibility," Pereira said. "Which ones she'll use, I don't know. But my guess would be that she'll deal with how femme identity is seen as an invisible identity, because [femmes] don't look like a typical lesbian. You can pass for straight. She may relate this to racial paradigms where people of color could "pass" for a different one. She'll deal with how these types of individuals relate to their community."

The lecture will take place at the Campus Center, Rooms 911-912 at 12:30 p.m.

The Lecture Series will typically be held at 12:30 p.m. every Thursday in the Campus Center during the semester, though the times and locations may change depending on performers' schedules and the availability of spaces. According to Peirrera, the series is "aimed at anybody who's interested in looking at the pursuit of sexual orientation in academia."

"UMass doesn't have a LGBT studies program," Pereira continued. "We offer [the lecture series] to fill that void." He said that some students can get credit for the lecture series through a course offered by the Women's Studies Department.

The Stonewall Center is interested in taking GLBT studies on campus even further, Pereira said. He said that those organizing the lecture series look for "people who are doing cutting edge research, people who are either researching, working or lecturing in areas of queer studies."

"We also try to get people from diverse backgrounds," he said. "We try to get as much of a reflection of the diversity of the community as we can."

The events are also open to a diverse audience, according to Pereira. He said that all members of the campus GLBT community, as well as their straight allies, are encouraged to attend.

Further information about the upcoming events is available on the Stonewall Center Website, at http://www.umass.edu/stonewall

Ridge heads Home Security

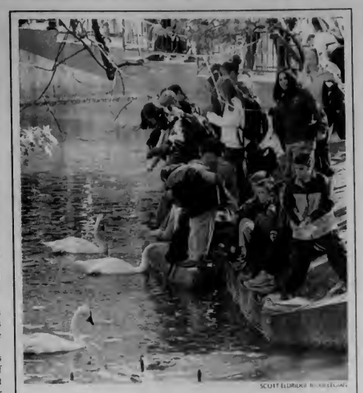
By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The White House announced Monday that while the United States launched attacks against Afghanistan that it would also look after security matters at home with the development of the new Homeland Security Office.

President George W. Bush explained in the televised event that he had chosen former Pennsylvania Governor Thomas Ridge to lead Homeland Security because he felt that Ridge was especially talented and qualified. He took the oath for the office yesterday morning and was sworn into the position by Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

"Tom Ridge has been a chief executive. He is a leader who has shown he can draw out the best of people and out of organizations. He is a decorated combat veteran of the Vietnam War. He is a patriot who has heard the sound of battle," Bush said. "He's seen the reach of terror in a field of his own state. He's a man of compassion who has seen what evil can do. I've given Tom and the Office of Homeland Security a mission: to design a comprehensive, coordinated national strategy to fight terror here at home."

The President, in his statements to the American people explained that the mission of Homeland Security was threefold. One goal, the President explained was to "take the strongest precautions against terrorism by bringing together the best information and intelligence. In a war on terror, knowledge is power." He also outlined other goals for the office as strengthening and protecting transportation, food and water and critical infrastructure systems in order to help prevent them from being susceptible to an attack.



"The Office will work in conjunction with the new Homeland Security Council, chaired by me and made up of my Cabinet and other senior officials," Bush explained. "The Office mission will have the full attention and complete support of the very highest levels of our government."

Ridge pledged his support to both the office and to the President, explaining that his office would provide the American people with both security and safety.

"Americans should find comfort in knowing that millions of their fellow citizens are working every day to ensure our security at every level – federal, state, county, municipal," Ridge said. "There may be gaps in the system. The job of the Office of Homeland Security will be to identify those gaps and work to close them. The size and scope of this challenge are immense. The President's executive order states that we must detect, prepare for, prevent, protect against, respond to and recover from terrorist attacks, an extraordinary mission. But we will carry it out."

He explained that he would place a strong emphasis upon candor and cooperation among his staff members in an effort to better address problems and to secure liberty.

"It's called Homeland Security. While the efforts will begin here, it will require the involvement of America at every level. Everyone in the homeland must play a part," Ridge said. "I ask the American people for their patience, their awareness and their resolve. This job calls for a national effort. We've seen it before, whether it was building the Trans-Continental Railroad, fighting World War II, or putting a man on the moon."

Administrator at the University of Massachusetts Division of Continuing Education simply said, "This is true." She has seen the workplace change in her over twenty-five years of service at Continuing Education. While she agrees with the survey, she also feels both "New Economy" and "Old Economy" skills are important. She often finds that once "people are in the workplace they realize that they aren't prepared and can't compete...and they need skills they can use in their profession."

Howard also commented on changes in the economy. She said, "when times are bad, enrollments are good." She also said "enrollments are greater now, but that we also offer tons more programs...we offer nearly everything you can imagine."

Another aspect of the study focuses on global competition. Most managers and new employees think that there will be greater competition for jobs from students coming from countries having stronger science and math programs. As a result, more than half of new employees suggest that undergraduates take more science classes, and over eighty percent suggest taking more math classes.

Agreeing with this assumption, Joan Stola said, "There is very direct [global] competition. Most UMass students don't realize it, but companies set up offices in Ireland, Germany, India and other countries when looking for new employees."

Go on with the show

America needs its entertainment

The Emmys, a night designed to celebrate the best of television's entertainers, was postponed yet again on Sunday due to the attacks on Afghanistan. The show, which was first scheduled for Sept. 16, was postponed due to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Now CBS, which sites both apprehension on the part of nominated actors and on the fact that it is not something that the American people may want to see right now, decided three hours before the event to postpone for a second time. The network is now actually considering canceling the show altogether, moving from asking those in attendance to wear somber attire to perhaps asking them not to show up at all.

The potential cancellation of the Emmys is a little ironic. The point of the show is to celebrate outstanding actors. These are people on television shows, though their portrayal of characters sometimes allows others to better understand human nature. Some of the television shows, such as the nominated West Wing, have actually addressed the attacks specifically and allowed the American people to use entertainment and television to cope with the tragedies that the country has faced.

Not allowing for the Emmys is the antithesis of what the country has been saying all along; it is showing people who are interested in harming the United States that we will change our attitudes and our behaviors because of their actions. We will not reward people who do a good job because it is inappropriate.

Beyond that, Americans need entertainment now more than ever before. We need to see television actors reacting to problems, we need to see something more than the harsh reality of the newscasts that we watch every other hour of the day, we need to watch other Americans moving on with their lives as well, namely actors.

If we are going to cancel the Emmys, why not cancel daytime soap operas or WWF wrestling, something that individuals watch in order to be submersed in a different world for a short period of time? Why did networks not cancel football on Monday night? It is simple: all of these things showed that a portion of American culture was moving on. It gave people something to look forward to and something to watch, all of these things were important to the American people. So is the awards show, something that was a tradition for many years. Those who did not necessarily care about it before are having it brought to their attention simply because it is an oddity; it is just another thing to remind us that terrorism has changed our lives and will continue to change our lives for some time to come.

Terrorism is wrong, not the Emmy awards. We should allow actors to get the recognition that they deserve.

In the name of the Father

What's the ingredient in the crisp, autumn air that brings out the religious fanatics? It started two weeks ago when, walking to class from the Student Union, I encountered, in all their fanatical glory, the religious crazies (I believe that's their registered name). They stood there littering a beautiful, fall day on a college campus with yelling and obtrusive white signs. Then, last week the old men in suits situated themselves at either end of the Campus Center and other strategic locations passing out little green new testaments. And while I was in town a few days ago, not only one but two individuals jumped in front of me, yelling, "Are you Jewish?!!" After a response of "no" they retreated. They just wanted to wish me a happy holiday, but I was a bit shaken up because the second inquirer nearly ran me down with her baby carriage and I admit to feeling a bit violated. And finally, the weirdest thing of all. I order a slice of black bean and avocado from Antonio's and, lo brothers and sisters, there on the slice before me, beans, feta and avocado bearing an exact likeness to the Blessed Mother.

I am suspect of anything done in the name of religion. I attended Catholic school for nine years. I dedicated a whole childhood to first Friday masses, memorizing the Beatitudes and contemplating the mystery of the Eucharist. Catholicism was figuratively beaten into me and my classmates. Fortunately, I was saved by a change in location and redeemed by a good public school system (yes, they exist) that taught me there are other things in the world that do not necessitate grasping rosary beads or clutching a crucifix.

I believe in the existence of a higher being. But there is a point, and I believe it is marked by holding big signs while screaming at college students, when the purpose and usefulness of that power becomes skewed and misinterpreted.

In case you didn't get to pick up a flyer from the fanatics with the big signs on their bi-annual visit, I will introduce you to their literature. Entitled "Diabolical Conspiracy, The Overture to HELL," the little pamphlet details the evils existing in society that will lead us straight to the devil. The cover illustrates what these "evils" are. According to the picture: Hollywood, graduation, AIDS, nuclear science, weight lifting, computers, music and money are just some of the things that will bring our impending doom. The leader details his personal experience, saying, "For the seeker of truth the educational system is a sham. A conspiracy of rebellion. I graduated from a University in Michigan. But I always sang 'off key.' I questioned the meaning of the lyrics – It seemed as though another song beckoned me."

"Sang off key." My guess is this guy wasn't even in the band. Do these people believe they will drum up support by making bad musical analogies and annoying campus visits?

"Religion is a poor scapegoat. 'God' is simply an idea that cowards hide behind when they are not capable of much else."

As much as I disagree with in-your-face religious tactics, I do not deem religious faith a weakness. Quite contrarily, faith, and I think this a greater factor now than ever before, is a necessary element for the psyche. The very sanity of the individual depends upon faith, because at times it is all we have. But faith is a guide, a strong belief in something greater, it is something you look toward in a time of need. It is not an excuse for anything.

I believe in a higher power. I don't believe He, She, Allah, Buddha, Mohammed or Christ would ever request me to die for them. I don't believe they would ever expect me to hurt the innocent or kill the creativity of others under their direction.

History has shown and the present reminds us that virtually nothing good has ever come from the claim that God's work be carried out. Lives have been lost, landscapes have been demolished, art has been destroyed, educations have been withheld and the innocent have been persecuted because those in power need a justification for their actions.

I will remind you that right now in the year 2001 our enemy from the desert has declared, "There is America, hit by God in one of its softest spots. Its greatest buildings were destroyed. Thank God for that." Scary, isn't it? We are removed from a world under religious rule. We have religious freedom, we have a separation of Church and State. However, we have been victims of "God's work," work which took the lives of the innocent and has now projected us into combat.

It would seem that when all else fails, God is called upon because He is universal, because He died for us, because we were created in His image and likeness. None of this has to do with anything. The higher being here is not the representative poor son of a carpenter; the higher being is power. Militaristic power and economic control is all that is being fought for – it has nothing to do with God.

Religion is a poor scapegoat. "God" is simply an idea that cowards hide behind when they are not capable of much else. God is an approbation to use fear. This past month I have overheard many say, "What kind of God would let this happen?" I have seen the Sistine Chapel, I have kneeled in many Churches. I have prayed, long and hard in the past few weeks.

I assure you that the God of beauty, answered prayers, miracles and righteousness is a very different God than the one that allows the murder of the innocents and causes fanatics to announce our inevitable descent into hell.

Bait and Switch

Before you turn on your television, before you crease the fold in your newspaper, before you tune your radio, pause for a moment and look at your watch, perhaps the clock in your kitchen. Don't record the time, just watch one of the hands rotate for a few minutes. Then, ask yourself a series of questions.

Have the British bombs dropped from American stealth planes satisfied your thirst for blood and silenced the drums of war? Has Osama Bin Laden slipped into Pakistan and evaded Sunday's assault? Will the Northern Resistance promote democracy and egalitarianism once our armed forces have evicted the Taliban? How many more UN workers will the air sorties kill? What outcomes to this assault do you hope for? Revenge? Justice? Do you believe the slaughter of Taliban soldiers and Afghanistan citizens will quell terrorism and promote peace? Do you cringe when you see Pakistanis burning the American flag? Do you curse the Taliban leadership for holding UN workers hostage? Are our airplanes free from future sabotage? Is our water contaminated with anthrax?

The Bush administration and the media have focused the attention of Americans on these pertinent questions. Our government has begun a war with a nation whose militants possess the cunning to assault our skies and destroy the symbols of our global economic superiority. The Department of Defense has committed thousands of officers in the American Air Force to attack the people who consider the United States their most hated enemy. In the ensuing military campaign, our bombs will kill many Afghanistan citizens and soldiers, while the air defense capabilities of the Taliban will kill some American pilots. Surely, the events unfolding following the Sept. 11 attacks on Washington D.C., New York, and Virginia cannot receive enough attention, analysis, and debate.

For the past three weeks, concerned Americans have increased their awareness to radio broadcasts, television news programs, and newspaper columns. Some organizations, such as the American Red Cross, have used this publicity to advance the welfare of our society by soliciting donations and distributing needed services.

However, not everyone has benefited from this elevation In consciousness. The collective attention of the United States continues to pass through a filter that has magnified the events related to the Sept. 11 attacks while blurring the rest of the domestic agenda. With few exceptions, our media consumers have forgotten the stories of immense national relevance that dominated public debate no less than a month ago.

Although Secretary of the Treasury Paul O'Neill has reassured us several times over the past 28 days that our economy has not fallen into a recession, three weeks ago the World Bank said that the global economy, upon which our nation relies, experienced its smallest growth since the Great Depression last year. On Sept. 12, Wall Street suffered its greatest single-day loss since the Great Depression. Two months ago, following two quarters of negative economic growth in the United States, America's unemployment rate ballooned from 4.5 to 4.9 percent. On Oct. 2, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Alan Greenspan decreased the federal funds target rate on overnight loans among bank from 3 to 2.3 percent, the lowest level since 1962. After spending $40 billion to resuscitate the airline industry, $20 billion to arm the Pentagon, and countless more money to save insurance companies nationwide, can Washington afford the high levels of social spending necessary to revitalize our economy and protect our workers?

The national economy represents only one problem that will disappear from the domestic spotlight as the United States responds to the events of Sept. 11 with a full-scale military assault. Will the president advance plans for an anti-ballistics system that breaks disarmament treaties with Russia behind the cover of national defense, patriotism, and terror? Will Congress allow the president to end the separation of Church and State by instating his faith-based service initiative? Will Attorney General John Ashcroft succeed in subverting the nation's civil liberties by requiring national ID-cards and loosening federal wiretap and seizure regulations? Will the Progressive Party promote Jesse Jackson Jr.'s presidential campaign platform that calls for a decent living wage, universal health care, and housing for all Americans? Will the FBI find ever find Shandra Levy and bring charges against Gary Condit for perjury?

President Bush's "war on terrorism" will not reverse the spin of our polar axes, no matter the campaign's affects; time has no heart from which to bleed. Our military presence in the Middle East should remain at the height of our national consciousness. However, we should not forget the rest of our affairs, unless we wish to invite more chaos into an already disturbed society. If the United States wants to restore calm within its borders, then we should not allow its domestic concerns to drift into the ether as our government pursues its interests overseas. The crisis of Sept. 11 requires an intense response; we must join our elected officials and journalists in addressing all the issues of the day, not just those that involve Globalism. The minute hand never stops; we cannot forget the responsibilities of living in a democracy.

Walk on? No way

My professor began class yesterday morning with a short discussion of the United States' attack on Afghanistan and the Taliban Regime that began over the weekend. He concluded the discussion by informing us that there would be a couple of lectures given in the Five College area which would discuss these actions and their repercussions. His final words were informing us of a walk out that students across the country were organizing. He then invited us to take part in it. Before we discuss the fact that a University professor was inviting his students to participate in a walk out, let's examine the effectiveness of such a walk out.

ADAM DEYOUNG

Students for a Peaceful Response is a group that has formed in response to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center. They are a group that has been organizing students from Universities across the country to take part in a walk out in protest of the retaliatory efforts of the United States.

I have no desire to criticize people who are in favor of a peaceful response, because I too would love to see a peaceful resolution to this situation. However, let's examine why walking out of classes is not an effective solution to the steps the United States government is taking.

First, it is important to ask what a walk out will accomplish. My answer to that question is NOTHING. Walking out on classes will do absolutely nothing to persuade any of our nations political leaders to change their minds about what they see as the right course of action. I would be very surprised if President Bush turned on the TV, saw that a bunch of college kids had walked out on their classes in protest of his decisions, and said, "You know, I think they are right. Call off the strikes."

Second, this walk out is detrimental to the college education of those involved. Missing classes for a walk out is not the way to garner attention for your views. It is a fact that everyone that goes to this school pays a very large tuition bill. Disrupting your education and the education of others in the process is not the logical solution.

There are other, more effective and less disruptive actions that the Students for a Peaceful Response can take part in. First of all, protests are a great way to get things accomplished. If it weren't for protests, nothing would have changed in the 1960s. So, go out and protest, but don't do it while disturbing the education of others. You will not be heard protesting on the campus of UMass. Take your voice to Washington where you will be heard. One of the greatest things about this country is the ability to assemble peacefully.

Another more effective way to protest the actions of the United States is letter-writing campaigns. If you are against the United States' war efforts, then write to your local congressman or congresswoman and the President. Tell them how you feel. They are representatives of you, and if enough people support the movement, perhaps things will change.

I don't usually agree with anti-American sentiments, because I am of the feeling that if you live in this country, you should realize that you live in the greatest country in the world. However, I do believe in everyone's right to speak out against government actions. It is our right and our responsibility to keep the government in check. Walking out on classes is just not the way to do that.

The University of Massachusetts is an institution of higher learning which is supposed to open your mind to different viewpoints while preparing you for "the real world." Having a professor invite me to take place in a walk out on classes was by far the most absurd thing I have ever heard. In essence, he was telling my classmates and I that it's OK to skip class, because protesting is worth it. This is criminal.

Walking out on classes is a method that has been used in protesting before and it will be used again. It is NOT effective and it is not constructive. So, the next time someone invites you to walk out on classes, don't do it. It will solve nothing and will hurt you more then it will help the cause you are fighting for.

Mythical Modernist expresses emotions in his valley debut

By Simeon Bittman
Collegian Correspondent

Michihiro Yoshida, otherwise known as "The Mythic Modernist," has been to Hiroshima just days after the WWII bombing, and he has been around the world with a paint brush, a pen, and a goal: to figure out what the heck is going on in this world. His artwork and some of his writing is on display at The Burnett Gallery at the Jones Library in Amherst through Oct. 30.

He was a 15-year-old in the Japanese Air Force when he found out World War II was over. He was walking through the smolder after the bomb exploded, and one can imagine what he was feeling. In the rubble he found an "art book," as he called it, and opened it up to a Cezzane still life. From then on, he was a painter.

"I use both painting and writing to explore and express my inner world and the enormous diversity of the world outside me," he wrote for his exhibition.

Yoshida has been referred to as "the artist who uses lots of eyes." One painting in particular, entitled "Juda's Despair," has a human figure with a big, drab eye. The figure stands on the ridge of a deep hole constructed with long, dark trees winding down into the pit.

"Juda's Despair" presents old school realism from the Rennaisance while mixing in some Van Gogh, and also geometric shapes. Much of Yoshida's art uses these elements in varying degrees, some more Van Gogh-y than others, and others influenced by the Renaissance art period.

Yoshida's realism with the people, the trees, the tree-people, and the apple, creates strong figures that evoke immediate emotional reaction. There are frightening hands and fingernails in his art. There is reference to religion, from ancient religion to the religion of capitalism. The viewer sees female figures floating in front of what looks like old Greek architecture.

Yoshida is from Kyushu, Japan. One piece titled "Japanese Commencement" shows a forest of what seems to be Japanese workmen, each with a head made from trees cut at the trunk, and just one tree left standing to serve as a head dress of sorts. He left Japan in 1960 to see the world. He stopped into America in 1967, and went to New York City where he set up a few exhibits. He continued to travel through 53 countries, and went back to Japan in 1971. It wasn't long before he headed back to America again.

"The United States is an ideal place to search for my identity, and to work out both confrontations and the harmony of the blend of the two cultures, East and West," he wrote in his biographical write up.

Back in America for the 70s, he came "to doubt the trend of modern art and the lack of universal and aesthetic values," and dropped painting for some time. During this time, he found writing as an effective way to express himself. He wrote 13 novelettes, five novels, and in Japan received three literary awards for writing. After 21 years or more, he picked up painting again.

The Mythic Modernist recently moved to South Hadley. The exhibit at the Burnett Gallery is his first public showing in the Pioneer Valley. He revised some old paintings for this showing, and a few new paintings came from the revisions.

Yoshida created a painting of Mt. Holyoke College called "Dancing with Color." Vibrant leaves blast primary colors on the foreground, over a backdrop of Mt. Holyoke's buildings. This painting emanates emotions of joy and beauty, which is much different than some of his darker works.

Yoshida displays the array of human emotion in his work.

"I try to express in my paintings the visualization of the variety of human spiritual and emotional life – the sadness, anger, hope, joy and beauty," he wrote.

The name of Yoshida's exhibit is Time...Sound...Wind. There are post cards and business cards, available to the public at the Burnett Gallery. A small booklet of other work is available, and there is a guestbook to sign if one so pleases. Most of his artwork is on sale to the public.

Time... Sound ..Wind will be on display through Oct. 30. The Burnett Gallery is located at 43 Amity St. Gallery hours are 9 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., Mon., Wed., Fri. and Sat., 9 a.m. to 9:30 p.m. on Tues. and Thurs., and 1 to 5 p.m. on Sun.

SERENDIPITY
Directed by Peter Chelsom with John Cusack and Kate Beckinsale
Playing at Cinemark Theaters

Is life a series of accidental moments? Or does some power or fate beyond us preordain our futures? In the new romantic comedy, Serendipity, fate dictates the relationship of Jonathan Trager (John Cusack) and Sara Thomas (Kate Beckinsale).

The film opens in a crowded New York store on Christmas Eve, with frantic shoppers grabbing last minute purchases. That's when Trager and Thomas' paths cross while both grabbing for the same pair of black cashmere gloves. Sparks fly, and the couple end up having coffee at (coincidentally, wink-wink) Serendipity, an ice cream shop. When the pair goes their separate ways, they don't exchange numbers, as they are each involved with someone else. But the two run into each other again, and Thomas, who believes strongly in destiny, takes it as a sign that she should give in to her curiosity and get to better know Trager.

But fate has its fun with the pair, and destiny divides the two. The movie speeds forward several years, to Trager and Thomas each engaged to someone on opposite ends of the country. Thomas' fiancée, a bizarre musician named Lars, is a Himalayan-inspired oboe-like shennai player. He's passionately romantic, but irrepressibly strange – with his Viking video for European Television (think new-aged Kenny G. in a video missing The 13th Warrior with that 80's video The Safety Dance). And so he has an undeniable flaw – he plays weird music, and his music comes before Thomas – so the audience can never actually like him. But Trager's fiancée is seemingly flawless, which leaves the audience feeling sorry for her, when the inevitable pursuit of a love lost (or never had) weighs heavily on Trager's mind.

The only hole in the movie is the lack of development of Trager's fiancée, because she never really seems as whole as every other character. Even small roles, like the store clerk played by Eugene Levy (famed for being the American Pie Dad) are thoroughly brought to life. It's just strange that in a film with such insightful writing, a main character is left soulless.

Writer Marc Klein creates fresh romance in the Hollywood world of recycled story lines. Serendipity, his screenwriting debut, is filled with deep and funny lines that make this movie a standout amongst hollow romantic-comedies like While You Were Sleeping and Runaway Bride. These insipid and predictable takes on love never include such smart lines as, "The Greeks didn't write obituaries. They only asked one thing when a man died – Did he have passion?" or "Maybe the absence of signs is a sign... – That's lucid."

John Cusack pulls off portraying another witty and endearing romantic. It's his forte – he does it well and at times can carry a movie. However, in this film, with such a strong cast and script, Cusack's talents only serve to perfect the film, rather than carry it. Cusack and Jeremy Piven (who plays the role of Trager's best friend) connect brilliantly onscreen and give the audience a sense of true friendship (an off-screen friendship fostered by their roles in Say Anything and Grosse Pointe Blank). Kate Beckinsale is charming, and after a starring role in this summer's Pearl Harbor, is poised to take the stage as one of film's top leading ladies.

Serendipity is one of those rare movies that you walk out of the theater saying you would change nothing. Only in deep retrospect can the single flaw of the movie (lack of depth in Trager's fiancée) be discovered. The film's easy flow and impeccable romantic and comedic timing is one rarely seen in the romance genre. While most will probably enjoy the movie, it isn't for everyone. Tough guys will say it's lame and will rather wait for The Fast and the Furious to come out on video. And those who sit at the movies and say "That would never happen" (to the sighs of annoyance from those sitting in around them in the theater) may not enjoy the eccentricities and multiple chance meetings that make the movie what it is. But to the true romantics, the closet romantics, the hopeless romantics and everyone else – Serendipity will deliver.

The many Faces of Tori

Amos gets chic for her new album

Just one of Tori's many new looks...

Strange Little Girls contains 12 songs by men in which Tori Amos continues, as her fans will attest to, her long and hallowed tradition of playing cover songs. In her concerts and past CDs, she could be expected to cover anyone from Bruce Springsteen to Joni Mitchell to Led Zeppelin.

Now, Tori brings us more unexpected covers, from Slayer to Eminem.

Covering songs almost always earns an artist recognition or popularity, without always having to really reinvent the music. This can gain them easy radio play by virtue of familiarity. But Tori, of course, just has to be different. Usually she maintains an echo of the original song in her covers, and that echo's all you're going to get here. She changes the essence of these songs, and suits them to her voice, her person. This seems to hold especially true in Little Girls.

The album starts off with a Velvet Underground cover that isn't particularly attention grabbing, but slow and contemplative. Then, Girls gets downright creepy. In one of her more interesting choices on the album, she covers Eminem's "97 Bonnie & Clyde."

Amos is just as weird here as Eminem is frightening. There's a beat in the background over which she voices the rapper's lyrics in a creepy whisper.

Eminem is a potentially controversial choice for a cover, especially for a woman. And especially considering that "Bonnie & Clyde" was the song that drew heat because of Eminem's narrator describing the murder of his wife, though this choice could be a perfect example of what Tori intends to do on this album. That is, use these songs to give a voice to women who are often the subject of art and music, but don't very often get a chance to speak.

The album picks up after this with the title track, "Strange Little Girl." Here Tori reminds us that although she can usually be found at the piano, her roots are in rock. And here too she reminds us of her bent towards electronic music that has characterized her most recent work.

With Neil Young's "Heart of Gold," she separates the chasm between original and cover even further. She doesn't have Young's aged persistence, but lends a fresh and youthful vitality to the song. The strong percussion and her passionate singing combine to make this song one of the most satisfying on the album. It's not a slow persistence, but a confused and earnest insistence that defines "Heart."

Her version of Depeche Mode's "Enjoy the Silence" breaks away from her electronic experimentation that would've gone hand in hand with the original. It's a soft, piano-driven piece that focuses on the lyrics in a radically different interpretation of the song, which still works in its new form.

Tori, as usual, has her fair share of anguish and pain to get across. But, this album is unmistakably fun in that weird way she's so good at achieving. Most of the fun in Girls lies in Tori's change into lots of new characters. For each song, she gets into someone else's head, and sings from their perspective. Even the liner notes are filled with photos of her in different outfits, hair and makeup for each song.

The covers are fun, but delve into some dark places. The Beatles' "Happiness is a Warm Gun," for instance, punctuated with sound clips of both George Bushes and news reports of John Lennon's death, speaks to the problem of violence and gun control. And though I'd hesitate to force this entire album under the heading of "political statement," she undoubtedly touches upon these issues.

The album ends with a beautiful rendition of Joe Jackson's "Real Men." Here she offers us a classic Tori song: her voice and her piano, which is true about many of the songs on the album. Despite the experimentation she has made in recent albums and on certain songs here, Girls is more of a return to both her rock and piano beginnings.

It's clear that Tori didn't do this album for the easy familiarity of cover songs. Because, well, they're not all that familiar. She reworks every song until it is entirely her own. Which means, fans of the originals may not like the album all that much. But Tori, whose following has reached cult status, has certainly pleased her fans with Strange Little Girls.

P.O.D. redeem themselves, Betty's bland brand of girl rock

P.O.D.
Satellite
Atlantic

Wow. It's amazing what a difference a few years makes.

P.O.D.'s 1999 breakthrough album, The Fundamental Elements of Southtown, was mediocre verging on bad; the title gem and single the only really listenable tune on the album. The band tried to be socially conscious commentators; ghetto supastahs, religious believers and a Van Halen-style party band all at the same time and it simply didn't work. The album went off in too many directions, few of the lyrics made any sense ("Dance around, floss your style" sticks in my mind as particularly atrocious – does my style have gingivitis buildup?) and vocalist Sonny's voice was thin and unmemorable.

For Satellite, take all of the above criticisms and reverse them.

The new album is good verging on really good, with probably the most mediocre song being the fluff single "Alive," which is fine for what it is, but pales in comparison to the rest of the songs. The band successfully comments on society ("Youth of the Nation"), the fabulousness of the ghetto ("Ridiculous"), religion ("The Messenjah") and even, yes, sad as it may be, the party ("Boom"). Even with all these different themes, however, the album still feels cohesive and whole, with an overall message of progress and optimism that is presented much more clearly than it was on The Fundamental Elements of Southtown.

While some of the lyrics are still trite ("I feel so alive, for the very first time, and I think I can fly" from "Alive") there are many, many more that show an amazing growth in songwriting maturity. The band even expands from its chunky-riff rap-metal sound to experiment with slower tempos on "Youth of the Nation" and even roots reggae on "Without Ish, Nothin."

The biggest surprise of all comes from lead vocalist Sonny. Formerly the Achilles' heel of the band, taking second stage to the fantastic drumming of Wuv and the low bass of Traa, he really comes into his own and puts himself at the forefront of the band on Satellite. His voice no longer wafer-thin, but thick and aggressive, he dominates every song on the record. His screams of "RISE" on "Set It Off" are legitimately frightening, and the flow on his raps seems much more natural and less forced. It's a great progression for someone who can now legitimately claim to be a high-stature frontman for a high-prolific rock band.

Leaps and bounds ahead of their past work, Satellite contains all the fundamental elements that P.O.D.'s previous work has lacked, and is well worth the listen. (Rob Schulze)

Girls rock. Sleater-Kinney, P.J. Harvey, Kathleen Hanna (the list goes on, Betty Blowtorch just sucks.

You can see the shtick coming from a mile away. Hey! We're some hard-rockin' girls! Watch out! Insert denim, studded belts, tattoos, and some AC/DC patches, and you're halfway there. Add Nashville Pussy T-shirts, leather pants, insanely generic song titles like "Hell on Wheels" and "Rock 'n Roll 69," and some sassy names like Sharon Needles and Blare N. Bitch and you have the most boring "rock band" that could ever be assembled.

But they're girls! Yes, they are, so all they have to do to be significant is pull the arcane cheeze-rock formula is pull a role reversal. Instead of guys demeaning girls, Betty Blowtorch craves a super-size handle in the self-explanatory "Size Queen" (complete with a moronic rap from appropriately crappy guest star Vanilla Ice), and offers watered down Dwarves rock in the others.

P.O.D. Wuv's you.

labored "Shut Up and Fuck" ("I don't want conversation/ I just want penis penetration").

Don't think that's the only crap Betty B has to offer, though. They get in on the self-loathing with "I'm Ugly and I Don't Know Why," and "Love Hate." They also feel free to name drop Lita Ford and Ratt, among others, in an attempt to resurrect an embarrassing time in music that should remain buried.

Betty is gracious enough to realize that any of their songs over three minutes is pure torture, so they keep the majority short and to the point. But there is no excuse for fifteen tracks, Betty! You don't rock for fifteen seconds! Lame-ass riffs and a lack of any real inspiration ensure that Betty Blowtorch (no, Mike, don't) BLOWS. There are tons of other bands like this (Hellacopters, Supersuckers, etc.) male and female that are a lot more creative and fun than these bums. (Mike Delano)

MORTIIS
The Smell of Rain
Earache

Finally, a group of cute synth-poppers from Glasgow have come together with a Norwegian elf! No, hell hasn't frozen over yet; the fan base for these two bands still couldn't be more different than night and day. It's funny how their music shares so many similarities, especially the fact that these are two solid albums. Bis and Mortiis both make big music out of small subject matter.

For Bis, I'm not sure what central they're returning to on "Return to Central" since I'd previously heard not a single earful of their music, but their hook-laden electronic music is downright massive at times. Not massive as in Top Ten, record sales, or a broad scope in lyrical content or musical experimentation. Big as in all encompassing, the kind of music you can get lost in. Unfortunately, they're only this good for about five and a half tracks, as the album sort of fades away on the second half. But what's good here is great, namely "the end starts today" and the pulsing "Protection." These tracks have a sound that explodes right open before the listener and keeps on expanding, tossing out some beautiful vocal melodies along the way. And all the while Bis isn't exploring the cosmos or interpreting Ezra Pound, they're talking about relationships and insecurities and miscommunication: everyday stuff.

Mortiis is no stranger to atmospherics that help flesh out his ambient sound, so the fact that he'll spend the better part of a song establishing and layering a mood is no surprise. But on The Smell of Rain he spends just as much time on hooks, creating what is already being called his "pop" record. The combo of darkwave and pop anthems may seem a little far-fetched, but it works pretty well for the most part. "Everyone Leaves" takes its sweet time building up to its final pace, but along the way creates quite an affecting scene of desolation and despair. Mortiis' vocals are never strained, and sometimes even sound passive, but they have a unique style and charm all their own, especially the "mmm, mmms" on "Scar Tek/Parasitic God." Yeah, sometimes Mort will get philosophical about religion or "smelling the witch," but his best writing tackles the universal themes of love and loss, as on the spiteful "Hus/Mental Maelstrom" and the black humor of "You Put a Hex on Me." Neither album is terribly consistent, but both have standout material that shouldn't be ignored. (Michael Delano)

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen hope to rebound after a heartbreaking loss to Syracuse last weekend.

■ back home

positives were taken out of the contest, not the least of which was the fact that the Maroon and White went head-to-head with a Top 20 team.

"We took it to them and had control of the game," Shea said. "We had a ball position field advantage and controlled the field space, but we didn't take advantage of our chances and they did."

Thus far, the Providence offense has been led by Courtney Dow, who has totaled five goals and three assists. Jennifer Chin has also been impressive, notching four goals (including a game-winner against Rutgers on September 29) and an assist in 11 games.

Although no other Friar player has totaled more than two goals, the team has garnered a winning record behind a stifling defense along with outstanding goal play. Netkeeper Meghan Moran has especially shined, posting a 1.53 goals against average to go along with four shutouts.

"They are a very good team," Shea said. "They are disciplined and have great speed on the forward line. It is a great regional rivalry and their kids play with a lot of emotion. We always play them in a nail biter."

Nowhere was this nail biting tendency more evident than in last year's game between the two squads, as the Minutewomen finally prevailed after two overtime periods and two periods of penalty strokes. Two years ago, UMass squeaked out another one-goal win, and in Shea's five-year tenure, Providence and Massachusetts have had all their games but one decided by a single score.

The game against the Friars will also be a good test for UMass, as it tries to prepare for the up and coming A-10 play. And that, according to Shea, is what really counts in the regular season.

"You can't look at the end result," Shea said, "because our goal has been the process [of getting better] all along."

Today's game will be a good test of just how far along the process the Minutewomen are.

Rams, Ravens seemingly on collision course for Super Bowl

We have finally made it to the quarter pole of the 2001 NFL season and a couple of things are for certain: the road to the Super Bowl will still go through Baltimore's Stone Wall defense, the St. Louis Rams are still the greatest show on earth, Tampa Bay vs. Green Bay, for my money, is the best rivalry right now in the NFL, and you couldn't pay me enough to watch the Lions, Cowboys or Redskins play. However, the Redskins and Cowboys are playing next Monday night; Dennis Miller is salivating over this game.

We start with the 3-1 Baltimore Ravens who, after a slip up against the Bengals in Week Two, have run off impressive back-to-back wins over Denver and Tennessee. I had said a few weeks ago that the Ravens would be in trouble this year due to their lack of a running game. Forget I said that. The only two touchdowns scored on the Ravens the last two weeks were on a blocked punt and a four-yard drive after an Elvis Grbac pickoff.

The Ravens D has given up 413 total yards in the past two weeks and that doormat running game has turned around after geriatric Terry Allen posted over 100 yards last week against the Titans who, unbelievably, are in the same breath with the Redskins, Cowboys and Lions — teams that are winless.

DR. DAVID ROSE

After Monday night, NFL watchers are dreaming of a Super Bowl match-up between the best defense, the Ravens, and the best offense, the St. Louis Rams. The Rams made it look easy on Monday night with a 35-0 win over those Lions, who really do suck. Kurt Warner had a field day, completing 29 passes for 292 yards and three scoring strikes. The Rams were 5-0 to start last year, but nobody though it was totally legit because of the teams that they beat. Now they are 4-0 to start this year and no one is questioning it. They have defeated Philadelphia on the road and San Francisco on the road and thrashed Miami by putting 42 points on the board.

The Rams are legit not so much for their high-powered offense, but because of a defense that has allowed just 53 points in four games. Combine that with their track team offense, and you have the makings of the best team in the league.

The Rams are on top of the NFC West by one game over the 49ers, who at 3-1 stand in good shape, especially with a schedule that includes upcoming matchups against two sheep, a goat and a mule, although the mule can kick some ass. The next three games for the 49ers are against the Falcons, the Bears and the Lions, who really do suck. Terrell "Superstar" Owens and Jeff Garcia have led the Niner offense, but the return of Garrison Hearst has led to the number one ranked rushing attack in the league.

Also, the young defense led by cornerback Ahmed Plummer and linebacker Julian Peterson have been a vast improvement over last year's atrocious defensive output.

While those two teams will battle it out for the NFC West, the NFC Central will be contested between the two teams that played a hard fought battle in Tampa on Sunday. The Buccaneers 14-10 win over Green Bay was a game that Tampa won because of its defense without much help from the offensive unit.

Haven't we heard this same song for the last five years? The Bucs have invested money in Keyshawn Johnson and Brad Johnson and it looks like a wasted investment because they have the most bland, vanilla offense I have ever seen. Here is an example of a drive Sunday: first down and 20: swing pass to Keyshawn for two yards. Second down and 18: swing pass to Keyshawn for two yards. Third down and 16: Brad Johnson gets sacked, bring in the punter. What the hell are they doing? Someone should tell Tony Dungy that they only have four downs to get another first down, not 20.

Anyway, the Bucs got the job done by intercepting Brett Favre three times, including one brought back 98 yards for a touchdown by Shelton Quarles. The only scene you needed to see to understand how intense this rivalry is — the picture lying down on the field after the game was over. Forget the Cowboys-Redskins or the Ravens-Titans, right now; there is no better rivalry than the Bucs and Packers.

Oh, speaking of the Redskins-Cowboys, they meet on Monday night. I never thought I would say this, but what channel is WWF Raw on? This game will actually be a close game, because both teams, like the Lions, really suck and the only question that will be asked is which team will want to give this game up more?

The Redskins went from Jeff George at quarterback, who can't shut up, to Tony Banks, whose comical play over his career speaks for itself. They are 0-4 and have been outscored by 110 points this year. The only thing sadder than their play is that this might be the way Bruce Smith leaves the game: on a loser, and after so many years of winning. It is horrific to see him leave on a team who has an owner who treats his signings more like it is fantasy football.

As for the Cowboys, their season is summed up in this one statistic: their lone rushing touchdown this year is by Tim Sedar — he's their placekicker. Their problems have turned into the problem of the rest of the nation: they are contractually obligated to play 12 more games. Oh yeah, Quincy Carter, the quarterback Jerry Jones handpicked to lead his squad this season, tore his hamstring on a simple throw where he was not touched. Lucky for him, he does not have to play in what should be a fiasco on Monday Night.

Now to the picks. There was no article last week, so as of right now my record is 1-1 after winning with the Rams over the Dolphins and coming up short with the Broncos over the Ravens. I will give you the fearsome foursome this week.

The Rams play against the New York Giants in St. Louis. The Giants defense has been pretty stingy this year and they look to slow down the Rams' high-powered attack. They said the same thing about Miami. Favored by 10 at the dome, I will go with the Rams.

Tampa Bay plays a Titan team that can almost abandon ship if they fall to 0-4. Which team do I take: Vanilla Tampa or worse Vanilla Tennessee. For this week give me the worse Vanilla Titans favored by 3.

Indianapolis is coming off a 44-13 beating at the hands of the New England Patriots. The Raiders are coming off back-to-back wins and are 3-1 this season. But the important thing here is that the Colts have an extra week to prepare. Peyton Manning and his offense will run wild and run up the score. Give me the Colts, giving 3 1/2.

The upset pick of the week will happen in Seattle. The Denver Broncos have one of the most potent offenses in the NFL. They come in with Rod Smith leading the league in receiving. The Seahawks have Trent Dilfer. Clear-cut win for Denver. Nope. Dilfer has won his last 12 starts. The Seahawks, a seven-point underdog, will not only cover, but will win outright.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – This is good time to call in those outstanding debts – including those things owed to you that transcend the monetary. Make reasonable demands or don't. Chances are your demands won't be fulfilled anyway.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Those in authority may have something over you today – until you are willing to come clean and share all you know openly with those around you. Now is a good time to tell them you wet the bed.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may be after a little more gusto in those you associate with today – and you can find it, surely, after dark. Take money along! Go to the frats!

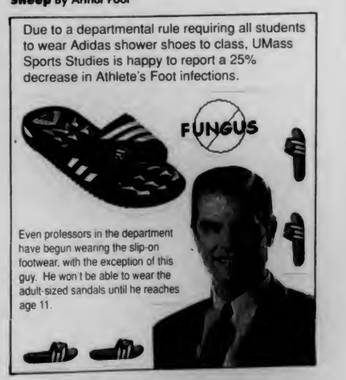
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Your calm, positive approach will be well received and appreciated by those around you today, who may not be as easy-going or relaxed. However, ping-pong is the greatest game ever invented. Learn it, live by it. Especially in the Big 'J.'

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Your intuition is keen today, but you may become derailed if you allow your intellect to control your decision-making. Balance is key. Or just flip a coin, but make sure it's double-sided.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Giving yourself unconditionally to a cause, a project or even a person may be required of you before the day is out.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Memories will play a large part in determining just how you will think and act today. Don't get lost, however, in your own past or the present for that matter. Lay off the sauce!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Others will seek you out today – if only to share their opinions in an unrestricted fashion. You are very approachable now. Make sure you go to the DC and get your fill of grilled cheese.



GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – The overall tone of the day may depend, in a large part, on one or two minute decisions you make upon rising. Others depend on you or your mom.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Yes Sports fans, Third and 48 is making a comeback. Make sure you pick up tomorrow's paper.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – A new and unusual opportunity arises on the homefront today, adding a new dimension to a familiar relationship. Explore and experiment!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Virgo, here you go. Here's your horoscope.

Treading East Coast waters

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Correspondent

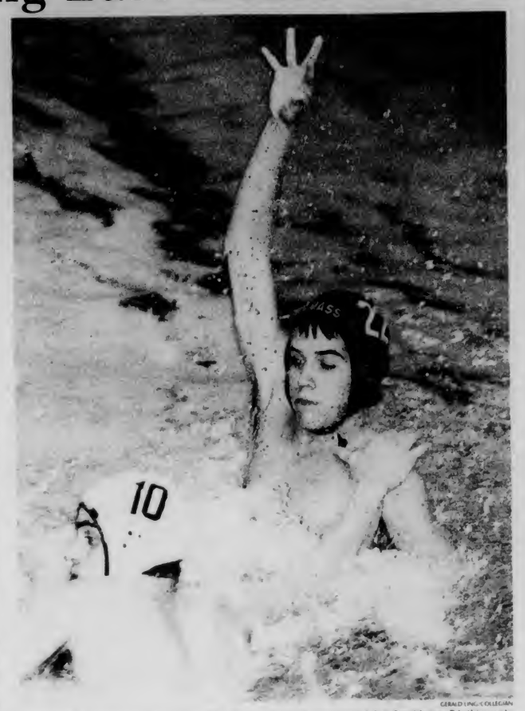
Turning point.

Among the many cliches that become the lexicon of the sports world, that one may apply the best to the Massachusetts men's water polo team coming off of this weekend's tournament at Brown University.

This weekend, the Minutemen won two crucial games against league foes Iona and Brown. However, they also suffered another double overtime loss to Queens College, their second in as many weekends.

UMass	12
Iona	4
Queens	6
UMass	5
UMass	9
Brown	7

Now, UMass is faced with a two-week layoff between games, during which the men will need to perfect a game plan that, thus far, has been mostly successful. The tournament at Brown may turn out to be the weekend that the team looks back at and sees where it either began a successful run at postseason glory, or where things began to slow down.



Coming off a 3-1 weekend at the North/South Invitational, the 12th-ranked Maroon and White came into the Brown Tournament boasting a 14-2 overall record. The opening game against Iona seemed to be a warm-up for the Minutemen, as they trounced the Gaels 12-4. Led by junior Ricardo Puig, who netted three in the opener, Massachusetts received tallies from nine different players in the effort. Freshman Adam Zobler scored two in the victory as well. J.R. VanderWall was typically solid, though didn't need to be, as he only saw six shots.

In the afternoon match with Queens, UMass again found itself in an interminable battle, much like last week's loss to Princeton. This time, the score was 6-5 when all was said and done, with the Minutemen on the short end. The winning tally came on a rebound off of the crossbar with ten seconds left in the second extra session.

"We successfully stopped [Queens] in a man-down situation, but when it was even strength they took a desperation shot that bounced right back to one of their guys in front of the net, and he put it away," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said.

The Knights were led by sophomore Mikhail Klechkov, with three goals. The Minutemen were stifled by the spectacular netminding of freshman Vedran Solac, who stopped 10 of the 15 shots he faced. Senior Adam Moore was the only member of the Massachusetts squad to find the net more than once, scoring a hat trick for the losing effort, including a tally on a penalty shot late in the fourth quarter to tie the game at four. Senior Carlos Ramos also scored a goal and an assist. VanderWall was also able to block eight, though it wouldn't be enough on this occasion. When asked about the ramifications of the game, Yarworth mentioned that, "Queens can now claim to be the best in the East until we knock them off."

In the Sunday finale, the Minutemen bounced back in similar fashion to last weekend, defeating Brown 9-7. Yarworth's post-game speech after the Queens match, in which he told the team, "Hey, wake up, you've gotta play again tomorrow morning," was apparently enough to spark the Minutemen to hold the Bears back, even as they charged up from a 9-2 deficit.

Freshman Jad Vonderbrink (No. 22) and the men's water polo team went 2-1 in Providence, R.I. this weekend. The only loss was a double-overtime heartbreaker.

Junior Justin Houck continued the impressive play he has shown all season, tallying three goals against the Bears. Moore and junior Nate Heidorff each netted a pair, and senior Mike Foley and junior Chad Arnold also scored one apiece for the Maroon and White.

Yarworth said of the Brown and Iona meetings, "I got something like 15 or 16 players in there, where I usually only use nine to 11. It was good to get the other guys in there, because if you look at the roster, I have a bunch of seniors [seven, including VanderWall, as well as former College Water Polo Association Players of the Week Greg Traver and Mike Foley], so the young guys need to be ready to step up next year."

While the Minutemen certainly have enjoyed some tremendous individual contributions, Yarworth has been stressing the importance of team defense to his players. However, he also highlighted the play of Evan Lutz as integral to the weekend's success.

Yarworth's crew has a high standard set for itself this year. "Overall, the season will be a failure if we don't win the Eastern Championship this year," Yarworth said. Though the number one spot isn't necessarily in a format where the top four teams from each division make the playoffs, Yarworth stresses the importance of league games, saying, "It's better to be seeded higher, so you don't have to worry about the opening round game, and can focus on the Semifinals."

At 16-3, the Minutemen look poised to be at least No. 2 in the Northern division. "We're still not playing our best," said Yarworth. A team that holds a record like 16-3, and that isn't playing its best yet is certainly a strong contender for the postseason. "We can't hang our heads too low [about the three losses], a coach with a 16-3 record can't cry poor."

In practice this week, the team will have its last chance to get in some substantial conditioning time, and then will be focusing on game situations next week. UMass's next opponent is the United States Merchant Marine Academy, based in Kings Point, N.Y. The Mariners are currently 5-11, coming off of a win over Fordham, and losses to St Francis and Harvard. The Mariners are led by junior captain Paul Kim.

UMass will then head to Providence to play Connecticut College and St. Francis. Connecticut College has a young squad, and while he doesn't expect his team to let down, Yarworth considers the USMMA and St. Francis games to be of somewhat more importance. St. Francis is a team that, at 13-4, could prove to be a very worthy opponent, and one which Yarworth expects to battle with for a top playoff spot.

With a break this weekend, UMass will look to re-energize, and begin the home stretch of the season with the same ferocity it showed in the first half.

Men's singles don't follow doubles' lead

The Massachusetts men's tennis team stepped onto the Upper Boyden Courts yesterday to challenge Hartford University. With a home court advantage and the memory of its 7-0 bruising of the Hawks last season in Hartford, it appeared that coach Judy Dixon and crew controlled the cards.

Unfortunately, the Maroon and White faced a vastly different Hartford squad, which acquired a new crop of talented, hungry freshman during the off-season. Also, No. 1 Hawk Pedja Zdravkovic, a returning starter from last fall, continued to dominate with his solid brand of tennis. In the end, the aggressive Hartford team proved to be too much for the Minutemen as it prevailed 6-1 in a hard-fought match.

"We're not hungry enough," said Dixon. "We can't lose a match like that, and losing to Hartford is a very big deal."

The Minutemen began the match with aggressive play as they made short work of Hartford in doubles play, 2-1, gaining the crucial point. The tandem of No. 1 Steve Prisco and No. 3 Scott Sani-Leeb breezed past Zdravkovic/Clint Broadie 8-2. Newcomer Reid Stubbs and seasoned veteran Phil Rodrigues also reigned victorious with an 8-3 stomping over the pairing of Evan Sideman and Dan Kirchner.

"We're pretty happy with the doubles play," said Prisco. "Scott and I played really well today. It's the best we've ever played together. The No. 3 doubles also played well together."

However, the momentum of the doubles win did not carry over to the singles play as the Maroon and White came up short in all six matches. Senior captain Prisco faced a tough opponent in Zdravkovic who delivered the goods for the Hawks with a 6-2, 6-4 victory.

"I didn't get off to a good start, but I still feel I played well," said Prisco. "He was just too good today. I almost came back in the end but I guess it was too little, too late."

The freshmen's dominant play in doubles did not carry over to the singles matches as No. 3 Sani-Leeb and No. 4 Stubbs both came up short 6-2, 6-2 and 6-4, 6-2, respectively. At the No. 6 spot, Ied Greenberg stepped in for Phil Rodrigues, who injured his hand during doubles, and lost a hard-fought, close match to Hawk Dan Kirchner 7-6, 7-5.

"We had one injury today with Phil Rodrigues and we put Ied in, who lost a close match," said Dixon. "Steve faced a tough guy and Todd played a great match. He was unlucky to not win that match when he was up in the third set. The rest of the team lacked intensity."

Tomorrow, the Minutemen will try to regain their desire, as they must regroup to face a tough Amherst College team on the Upper Boyden Courts at 3 p.m. The Hawks defeated Amherst 4-3 earlier in the season and its squad mirrors the Minutemen in many areas.

"They're pretty similar to us in ability," said Prisco. "Their No. 1 player, Brian Wexler, is a friend of mine. I've beaten him every time I've played him, but he's talented. They're all consistent baselliners."

To defeat Amherst, the Minutemen must play with more intensity and passion than they did against the Hawks. The fall season does not count on the Atlantic 10 Conference record, but these warm-up matches do serve as somewhat of an indicator of the squad's level of play for the spring.

"We have to improve our intensity this fall," said Dixon. "Our practices have to get tougher. There's too much negativity on the court. We have to see now who really wants to be here and who really loves tennis. The match against Amherst could go either way and they have a very laid back style, [which] is different from Hartford. They'll look for us to make mistakes. Right now I'm looking for more fight from my freshmen and for Eric Reblin to step up his level of play."

Field hockey finally returning home

There is no place like home.

And with a click of its maroon heels, the Massachusetts field hockey team finally returns to Amherst to host Providence College on its own turf (Richard F. Garber Field), after playing eight of its first nine games on the road.

Today's contest marks an end to a six-game road trip, in which UMass failed to make a stop in Kansas, but seemed to go almost everywhere else.

"We're not going to know what to do with ourselves," said Head Coach Patty Shea, laughing. "We're going to have to get on the PVTA bus and take a ride around campus before the game.

"It will be nice to be home," she added, speaking more seriously. "Though, sometimes there are more distractions at home. The road gives you time to settle in and think about the game."

Both the Minutewomen [3-6, 0-0 Atlantic 10] and the Friars [7-4, 1-3 Big East] are coming off losses, so both teams will be looking to right the proverbial ship. The Maroon and White's defeat was especially heartbreaking, falling to Syracuse last Saturday when the Orangewomen scored the game-winning goal with no time left on the clock.

However, according to Shea, that game is ancient history.

"It's over and done with," the fifth year coach said. "We have another game to play."

Even though UMass ended up losing to Syracuse, many

THE FIN NISH-ING TOUCH

A scant 4,000 miles to the northeast, nearly one-third of the way around the world, lies Helsinki, Finland. In 1978, two children entered the world there, with the state of Massachusetts the farthest thing from their parents' minds.

Fast-forward 23 years. Today, Toni Söderholm and Samuli Jalkanen are two of the most dedicated leaders for the Massachusetts hockey team. The two have patrolled the UMass blueline for a combined five seasons, but their story is much more in-depth than that.

"They bring the experience and the maturity that every team needs," said UMass head coach Don Cahoon. "They've played a lot of hockey and they're highly conditioned athletes and highly motivated athletes. When you couple [their experience] with maturity and skill level, they bring a high-end game to the table. I think they'd be good players for any team in the country."

In addition to their strong play, their hard work has earned them the right to wear letters for the team this season. Söderholm has been named team captain, while Jalkanen – along with senior defenseman Randy Drohan – will serve as his assistant.

"They're both obviously leaders on our team because they're both wearing letters," said senior goaltender Mike Johnson. "I thought it would be difficult for them being that they are from another country – maybe that they wouldn't have the comfort level to come out and say something – but definitely they are more than adequate to do the job."

If, by chance, a person happens to catch the two bluliners off the ice, the likelihood is that it would be in the weight room, where both take part in a rigorous training regimen year-round that, along with lifting, includes running, biking and other quickness-improving games.

"They are the two best conditioned athletes on our team, bar none," Johnson said. "They work hard and set an example for everybody else to work hard both in the offseason and during the season. They show you what you have to do at this level and they're very successful because of it."

And their lead-by-example attitude doesn't just apply to the younger players on the team.

"What's important is that when you're working out you stay consistent because [otherwise] you're not going to gain cardio [capacity], not going to gain weight in a matter of months. You're going to have to keep at it for a while," Söderholm said. "Sami's really been a role model for me in that way...you could almost say that Sami's been my hero in the weight room for a while, so I'm just trying to catch up with him."

Leadership is especially important for the Maroon and White this season, as the 26-man roster features 11 freshmen, three of which are defensemen.

"Their character is such that they're really good role models," Cahoon said. "They represent the best in the student-athlete. From that standpoint, I hope the kids pay close attention to the way they go about their business."

"We have a lot of young guys, so you can tell them if you see something they can do better," said Jalkanen in reference to his role as a leader. "But basically, I'm just trying to do everything like I did before and maybe a little bit better if possible."

Perhaps the most impressive aspect of the pair's hockey presence is its whole-hearted dedication to improving its game in any way possible. Be it attention to detail, their practice outside of conventional hours or their focus on physical improvement, the two are among the hardest workers in Hockey East, if not the nation, according to Cahoon.

"I'd put them up against any two kids in any other program in terms of what they do on a day-to-day basis," he said.

But as much as the two Finns are alike off the ice, they are polar opposites as to how they play the position.

Söderholm's six-foot-two frame allows him to play a much more physical game than the five-foot-ten Jalkanen. On the other hand, Jalkanen uses his quickness and agility as his main weapon in the defensive zone.

"Sami's a little bit more defensively oriented than Toni – Toni is a little bit more of a risk taker," Cahoon said. "I wouldn't trade those components because you need both types – the stay-at-home skating defenseman and the guy that's a little bit more to the offensive side of things. They will be, on a continuous basis, out against the best opposition that is thrown out against us."

As a sophomore last season, Jalkanen had a banner year for the Minutemen, putting up 14 points on the season and catching the eye of many people in the Hockey East world with his strong defensive play. His play earned him a nomination for Hockey East's Best Defensive Defenseman and All-Hockey East.

"Sami's heart [is his greatest attribute]," Johnson said. "He can do anything he wants because he wants to. He'll run over the biggest guy because he has the heart to do it. He's got a great conditioning level which makes him that much better than anybody else."

But, according to Cahoon, the most impressive attribute of the junior's game is his consistently strong play.

"Sami has the ability to keep his down cycles to a minimum and basically what you get day in and day out is pretty consistent," Cahoon said.

As for Söderholm, the more offensively minded defenseman

SGA speakers discuss cameras and housing

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Chair of the Board of Higher Education Steven Tacco surprised the Student Government Association Senate meeting last night by addressing issues regarding the decline in our state budget.

"Due to an economic fall as a result of Sept. 11th, Massachusetts overall budget has been cut by $270 million dollars," Tacco said. "Everyone has had to go back to the table, but myself and President William Bulger have been fighting on behalf of higher education."

Tacco also gave advice to the Senate, saying that policy issues must have good ideals and debate but warning them against falling into a one-party system.

Director of Housing Services Michael Gilbert also addressed the Senate and answered questions regarding cameras on campus, towel dispensers in residence halls and Greek housing districts.

Gilbert addressed questions regarding the surveillance cameras located in the John Quincy Adams and Van Meter Residence halls. Gilbert stated that cameras have been placed due to a growing safety concerns on campus.

"Over the past couple of years we've had major concerns with individuals climbing on roofs, as we've had an incident last year in Butterfield [Central Residential Hall]," Gilbert said.

The Butterfield incident Gilbert mentioned was referring to Thomas Degnan, a Butterfield resident who was critically injured after falling 55 feet off the roof of the dormitory last April.

Gilbert also addressed questions regarding the ongoing issue within the SGA of the Greek housing definition. Over the past year the SGA has suffered ramifications due to the definition of the Greek housing being On-Campus Non-Residential. Despite controversy, that remains the legal definition of the Greeks houses.

"I wasn't in the room when the SGA drafted their Constitution and I know that there has been issues," Gilbert said. "However, Housing has their own definition and our view is that [only] Residential Halls and family housing are on-campus housing."

Gilbert concluded by explaining that Housing Services is faced with $70 million in deferred maintenance at UMass, and that housing is looking at what is important in determining priority.

A brief 10-minute intermission followed the speakers due to a lack of communication between SGA President John Sheehan and Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders. A scheduled vote on appointments to the Campus Center Student Union Commission

Anti-War activists stage walk-out

By Ken Campbell

Students For A Peaceful Response, an anti-war activist group, staged a walk out yesterday at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

The event protested Operation Enduring Freedom (OEF), the U.S. military action against Taliban and terrorist controlled areas of Afghanistan.

After an opening moment of silence, SPR member Chris Thomas welcomed the small group of students who gathered in front of the Student Union at 9:15 a.m.

"We encourage you to read up," Thomas said, gesturing toward several tables set up to the side of the podium. "We can't build a movement against war unless you know what it is you are mobilizing against."

There was no set agenda for the gathering, and participants were encouraged to come forward and speak out against OEF.

"I see politicians saying 'I speak with one voice.' We're showing by showing up today we're proving that wrong," Randy Choiniere, a graduate Labor Studies student said. "See through the dogma, see through the rhetoric, see through the hypocrisy. George W. Bush does not speak for me."

Graduate students from the Labor Relations Center cheered Choiniere on, then talked quietly amongst themselves.

"I'm against the war. I think that the ideal would be world court. They [terrorists] should be extradited," said one graduate student, who only wished to be called Robert. "Afghanistan wouldn't turn the terrorists over to the United States. I think there would be more justification [for air strikes] if they refused to extradite."

Corrado, another graduate student, believes that the United States is at least partially responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks.

"We have to accept some responsibility; we can't go around terrorizing other countries without expecting it here," Corrado said. "It [the war] ignores the underlying principle for the cause of terrorist attacks on our soil – U.S. foreign policy."

Joe, a Labor Center graduate student, was against OEF because he thought it wasn't well defined enough.

"A lot of us are concerned about an ambiguous and undefined war. There are some defined objectives but a lot of undefined," Joe said. "Bin Laden and the terrorists should be

The Dialog Project of Amherst leads community discussion on terrorism

By S. J. Port
Collegian Correspondent

The Dialogue Project of Amherst sponsored a community discussion entitled, "Terrorism: How did we get here? Where are we headed?" at the Crocker Farm School on Tuesday, Oct. 9. The gathering featured speakers Andrea Ayvazian, Dean of Religious Life at Mount Holyoke College, and Michael Klare, Director of the Five College Peace and World Securities Studies Program.

The Dialogue Program promotes dialogue as way to "building democracy and community." Started in an effort to facilitate respectful discussions over the controversial proposed production of West Side Story at Amherst High School, the Dialogue Program has now turned its focus towards supporting dialogues and gatherings to learn about the issues at hand in Afghanistan and in the United States. Member Pat Romney defined the project's motives as a move to promote "civil and civic dialogues," adding that she felt the evening would be most useful if thought of as an opportunity to hear "particular informed points of view" which could then become a kind of "starter dough" to use in garnering a further understanding of the situation.

In order to take full advantage of speaker Michael Klare's small arms expertise and broad knowledge of the politics involved with terrorist attacks, the Dialogue Program and fellow speaker Andrea Ayvazian only made brief statements to allow most of the time to Klare.

"We've been asked to return to pre-attacked lives in a post attack world, we're living with a split screen," said Ayvazian.

As Dean of Religious Life at Mount Holyoke, Ayvazian said has been counseling students and fellow faculty members throughout the past month and sees several distinct trends.

"Our immune system's are depressed; how many people here have been or known someone to be sick in the past weeks?" Ayvazian asked. "I'm worried about us. We have to start talking to each other directly, we are at risk right now."

Ayvazian went on to say she worried about kids; students included, whom she sees as being in distress right now and not knowing how to deal with it. "In addition to this they're picking up on our distress," Ayvazian said.

To counter act these symptoms Ayvazian suggested people take on concrete tasks in addition to philosophizing and communicating.

"It's a really good time to find things to do with our families and within the community," Ayvazian. "We can put our body inside this crisis."

Klare, a long time peace activist, spoke about the groups desire to be better informed on both the history of the Middle Easterns situation, specifically in Saudi Arabia and Afghanistan, and the current political plans and foresights.

"I think we all need discussion. It is my feeling that our leadership is not being very helpful," Klare said. "They are not giving us the kind of information we deserve as citizens."

As Klare began to speak the roar of low flying planes overheard sparked him to say, "These are the planes that will soon be carrying troops and such from here to there," waving his arm.

After summarizing what Klare saw as the United States'

"We may see the closure of buildings if these problems continue."

The Music Department is quiet. Granted, it is a Friday before Columbus Day weekend, and it is customary for campus to be deserted on such a day. But those who inhabit the Fine Arts Center are usually of a different breed, accustomed to working here till the 11th hour. The absence of music in these halls is not typical.

Here and there secretaries, administrators and a few professors are working in offices with their doors open and a makeshift system of electric fans running in the hallway. A few vocalists can be heard in one of the studios upstairs, struggling to stay on pitch in an environment that continues, fans notwithstanding, to be stifling.

The lack of air circulation is merely palpable on the upper floors. Downstairs, in the space used most by students, including several classrooms, a hallway full of lockers, and two corridors lined with small practice rooms, the air is still. The temperatures are stifling. And the silence is deafening.

"We have been without air conditioning since the very first day of classes [this year]," says Chris Thornley, the Director of Facilities for the Music Department. According to Thornley, one of the building's large chiller units, which cool outside air as it is circulated through the building, was struck by lightning over the Labor Day weekend, and, he said, the entire system has been out since Registration Day, on September 5.

Thornley and others cited transportation difficulties after the September 11 attack on the World Trade Center for the delay in repairing the units.

Students, looking for someone to blame, have spread rumors recently about corruption and neglect in dealing with the system. Some students have claimed that the University knew about malfunctions in the chiller units up to a year ago, and did nothing to solve the problem. Still others said that calls to Environmental Health and Services were deliberately deflected on University orders to "cover up" the problem.

Thornley and FAC Associate Director for Operations and Facilities Jim MacRostie categorically denied these rumors. No evidence of their truth could be uncovered from other sources, including professors, several students and the Chancellor's Office. "Those are rumors," Thornley said.

Also a rumor, according to Music Dept. Professor Elizabeth Parker, is a sort of urban legend that has sprung up among Music Dept. students that the bodies of dead pigeons have been trapped in the ventilation systems and contaminating the air for years.

"Someone had told me a few years ago about seeing pigeon feet sticking out of a ventilation grate," Parker said. Those vents haven't been cleaned for years, she admitted, but she could not confirm the sighting personally.

What she said she could confirm, however, is that the readily apparent ventilation problems in the FAC are bad enough. "It's been a very hard month for us," she said.

Parker went on, "there's no ventilation. There's no air in here unless doors are propped open." She said that this is a problem in the Music Department because musicians need relative quiet in order to practice. She told of a brass-choir rehearsal in one of the classrooms in recent days that drove other students out of the practice spaces with its volume when the doors were propped open for air circulation purposes.

Parker said she has been personally suffering from a number of health issues that she and her doctor relate to the current ventilation problems in the building. Parker said that there is mold growing in the lower-level classroom ceilings, and that the recent humidity, heat and stagnation have been causing it to flourish.

MacRostie and Thornley said they had not heard of such a problem. "I think that would have been brought to my attention," MacRostie said. "And it hasn't."

Still, according to Parker, her allergist has advised her to stay away from the building as much as possible. She has had to cancel or curtail office hours for students in her classes, and also said that students have been similarly impeded in their studies.

"The temperatures in the classrooms are very high," she said, "and students are having problems because of it." She said symptoms of heat fatigue and allergic reactions ranging from headaches, fatigue, nausea, dizziness, itching eyes, coughs and colds have been reported.

According to Parker and others, this is especially damaging for voice majors, whose instrument is a part of their bodies. When respiratory symptoms occur, it hinders their training, Parker said, adding about her office, "I can't teach a singer in here."

Normally, according to Parker, members of her Opera Workshop ensemble have the space for rehearsal and instruction. "Not anymore, at least right now," she said.

Parker was especially interested in advocating for the students under her supervision. "These kids spend four years trapped underground," she said. "But they deserve all the best."

Other professors have joined with Parker in trying to ease the impact of the problems on students. It was reported by several students that Voice Professor Paulina Stark was offering some private lessons at her house since the ventilation problem grew worse.

Junior Vocal Performance majors Laryssa Sadoway and Heather Curley said they felt their studies had been impeded by the ventilation problem. "I can't breathe in there," Curley said.

Sadoway reported that she had been facing health problems in recent weeks. She said she had been to Health Services three times in the past week, but that there was nothing they could do for her. She was given the number for Environmental Health and Services, she said, but had not called it yet. She said she felt frustrated because she was without resources for dealing with the problem. "Whoever you're yelling at, you get the feeling you're still yelling at the wrong person," she said.

"Our complaints fall on deaf ears," said Senior Vocal Performance Major Kellie-Marie Leavitt. She agreed with her colleagues that the problem is hardest on singers in that the building is not currently a pleasant atmosphere.

"It's like a petri dish. When someone gets a cold, and the air doesn't move, everyone gets it," she said. "We have epidemics in the FAC, and this is the worst it has ever been."

Leavitt, who reported never having strep throat before entering college, said she has frequently contracted the disease in recent times and believes the conditions in the FAC to be the cause.

"If this were a place where we spent two hours a day, [the current problems] still wouldn't be excusable, but it wouldn't be as bad," Leavitt continued. "But people are there all the time. You are looking at ten hours a day if not more. When people spend that much time there, there's definitely going to be some kind of long term effect."

Meanwhile, an employee who declined to be named said she had spent longer in the building than most students who only stay for four years and has suffered a number of health problems as a result.

The employee said that she had a history of asthma, and it had driven her to see her doctor three times in the past two weeks. She said she had set up two fans and an air cleaner in her work area, but even that, combined with a number of inhalant and prescription drugs she takes regularly, have not allayed the problem.

"It's brutal in here," she said. "And it's not just me. It's been brutal on the students too."

Students must use the practice rooms downstairs and thus do not receive any air, she explained.

"They've been good about not complaining too much," she said, "but that's because they don't have a choice."

She said that the chillers have been down for over a year and that "the [Music Department] wing has been a constant problem," noting that three and a half years ago, pneumonia that she connects with water leakage problems in the building kept her out of work for six weeks.

Leavitt pointed out that when individuals, especially performers, suffer health problems, entire ensembles are affected, and that in turn affects the department in its recruitment of new students.

"[The Department] is not getting new students to come here. It's not getting new students that do come to stay here, and it's not getting older students to recommend coming here," Leavitt said. "Who wants to be in a place where to do what you love to do means you risk getting sick?

She concluded that something must be done in order to curtail these health problems, for fine arts at UMass are in jeopardy.

Parker speculated about the reasons for the current problem, citing high levels of financial aid, rigidly fixed tuition prices, and high investments in athletics as part of the problem.

If you look at our department, you see that, say, Lynn Klock is only teaching one student on the saxophone at a time, but in, say, the engineering department, one professor is teaching hundreds of students in bigger classes, so we don't appear to be cost-efficient," she explained what she believes to be an unfair evaluation of the department.

Senior Music Major Heather Trammell also criticized funding allocations at the University.

"Work in FAC has definitely been crippled," she said, adding that Prof. Parker, whom she studies with, has been unavailable to students as a result of her health problems.

"This isn't a decent environment for students to work properly or practice effectively," Trammell said, "and that means in general that they're not getting as much out of the education they paid for as they should be."

Believing that this problem comes down to a matter of funding, Trammell offered, "Maybe they [the University] have their funding in the wrong place."

She said she had seen Room 149, a research computer lab and practice space on the lower levels, being refurbished with new tables and chairs, and that this had been disappointing in light of the greater ventilation problems.

"I would hope that [the University] would prioritize their students who are paying for an education in a safe and comfortable environment," Trammell said. "[But] I've never seen any effort on the University's part to try and correct [the problems]."

MacRostie countered that the Physical Plant employees are doing whatever they can do in order to fix the problem, explaining that while the employees are overloaded with maintenance projects in all the buildings on campus, they have been spending whole days on this particular situation.

"[Physical Plant employees] have made it possible to draw in outside air," he said, "but the problem is that you're still drawing in hot air."

He said that the University lacks the resources to fully renovate the system. The chiller units, according to Thornley, cost at least $500,000 apiece to replace.

"What we're looking at now," said MacRostie, "is whether we're going to replace one and repair the other, or whether we'll have to replace both."

In the meantime, he said, the Physical Plant workers are doing the best they can. "They're handling it as well as it can be handled," he said.

"It was a freak electrical surge [caused by lightning]," MacRostie pointed out, that destroyed the units in the first place. "It's one of those things that can happen at any time. I don't think anyone can predict things like that."

Not everyone that uses the FAC has seen this as such a dire situation. Ron Macheau, Chair of the Art Department in the FAC, said that he felt that while the building is uncomfortable, he has not seen significant health problems. He also said that certain solvents used in art projects had been moved out of the building for safety reasons because the temperature is out of control, but the Art Department had not really been inconvenienced by the problems.

Students of one art history professor, however, spread rumors that the heat and other conditions lined to the lack of ventilation had damaged some of his course materials, including slides. This professor could not be reached for comment as of press time.

dead or in jail right now, but they are monsters that U.S. foreign policy has created.

"There are no easy answers."

As the morning went one, the crowd gained some numbers, but attendance overall remained sparse, numbering roughly 50.

Around 10 a.m., two students with American flags and patriotic signs stood several yards away from the podium. Chris Carlozzi, a junior political science student, said that he was there to show that UMass students were "rational."

"We're here because the United States has taken a strong initiative against terrorism," Carlozzi said. "If these people are here to oppose that, we're going to show them that there are people with rational minds."

Sophomore political science and philosophy major Kiera Manikoff agreed.

"We are here to show support for our country; unity for both the administration and our country," Manikoff said. "It dismays me that everywhere around the country people are supportive and then you come to UMass and you see this. It's anti-American."

SPR members continued to speak at the podium, while others made signs and still others bobbed for apples.

"That's boh," Thomas said. "Not bomb."

Roughly a third of the small crowd gathered around Carlozzi and Manikoff, and began debating a wide range of social issues.

Towards 11 a.m., as hundreds of people streamed past the Student Union and the protest, Thomas retook the podium and urged SPR supporters to return to their classes.

"Go back," Thomas said. "Tell them what's happening, and bring them back here with you."

Olaf Aprons, who lingered near the back of the rally clutching a small American flag, surveyed the crowd.

"I like half my class walked out," Aprons said, adding that he didn't see them at the rally. "They probably went home."

had been placed on the agenda, but neither Sheehan nor the prospective appointees had attended the meeting. Senate members discovered a memo from Sheehan placed in Associate Speaker Bill Powers' box stating that the appointments were tabled to the next Senate meeting. After this miscommunication, Saunders apologized for the delay and the meeting continued.

"It's inevitable that that we'll go through some pains, and I'm not happy that this miscommunication occurred," Saunders said. "It didn't hurt us, but it hinders us when miscommunication occurs."

Further issues were addressed as the Senate approved three new Elections Commissioners. Joshua Epstein, Maggie McNally and Linsonjude Naval were approved unanimously, thus ensuring five approved elections commissioners for the next elections in a few weeks.

The Senate then addressed and passed a resolution supporting a motion passed by the UMass Faculty Senate urging the University to look at its funding imbalances between athletics versus academics. The SGA differed from the Faculty Senate by specifically requesting that money for academics not be taken from the Student Affairs budget.

"Our mission is improving student life and the Faculty Senate's is improving academics and we certainly have a vested interest and share their concerns," Saunders said.

Chair of Public Policy and Relations Michael Whitehouse, along with his committee, sponsored the resolution and continued by explaining that it is not only about learning within the academic realms of the University, but outside as well.

"Half or more of my education comes from outside my academics," Whitehouse said. "This resolution is our general opinion stating that we want to make sure that more money is given to academics, but not taken from Student Affairs."

in the FAC, called the problem "horrendous."

"It always is," he added.

Golden said he had been in the department for twenty-three years, and recalled earlier problems with the ventilation in the building this time with the heating. This breakdown caused a cold Golden called "inhuman," saying that it had especially affected the performance of dancers and actors in the Rand Theater.

While he cited his fellow Co-Chair Penny Ramson's "brave efforts," in pushing the University to solve the problem, Golden said that the continuing problems are depressing.

"It never ever seems to be right in any season," he said. "It never seems like anyone gets a handle on the essential problem and fixes it."

Golden also blamed the problems in part on the structure of the building, with much of the classroom and theatrical space underground, and with windows on the upper floors that do not open, calling the building "a bunker."

He also expressed frustration with the University administration. "The bureaucracy doesn't help," he said. "Messages don't get through."

The University administration has long been a scapegoat when it comes to issues of funding. But it is facing its own obstacles in the repair of the FAC's ventilation systems, and it turns out that the administration may not be as [illegible] or as sinister as many believe them to be.

In a telephone interview, Ted Widener, the Associate Vice Chancellor for Facilities and Campus Services, defended the recent operations of the Physical Plant and the University administration.

In response to widespread student criticism that the School of Management was receiving a new addition while the FAC suffered from a lack of air, Widener said that the University had received funding for the School of Management project from an individual donor.

He said he could not identify the donor, or whether that donor was an alumnus or member of the community, but he did report, "We're not going to look at a donor willing to give several million dollars and say, 'Thank you, but we don't want your money.'"

In response to allegations of inaction on the Administration's part Widener said that the University conducted a survey several years ago with an independent firm to determine the cost of repairs to all buildings on campus, including the FAC.

"We concluded that we'd need $22 million a year, adjusted for inflation, over 20 years, for adequate repairs," he said. "That's a total of $400 million," adding that the University had brought the proposal before the Board of Trustees, but the money was simply not available.

He said this was due to the limitations on funding that the University receives from the state, which translates into the money willingly spent by taxpayers on higher education.

Widener also cited recent financial issues in the state such as those associated with Boston's Big Dig for the funding shortage.

"We are not the only campus, or the only state, where this problem has occurred," he said, "Sometimes there's just not enough funding for higher education."

In the meantime, Widener said, "We prioritize to the best of our ability that $400 million worth of work. It's difficult for us to solve all the problems the way everyone wants." He said that, ironically, the current system of emergency repairs and "band-aid methods" will end up costing the University more in the long term.

Widener also said that the air conditioning in the FAC had been on the list of urgent projects, "but it failed before we were able to get to it."

Echoing the frustrations of students and faculty, Widener said that the recent statistics on the discrepancy between the academic spending at UMass and comparable institutions is part of the problem.

"That $658 dollars less per student is exactly the kind of revenue that would pay to fix the air conditioning," he said.

Meanwhile, Widener said, in order to fix the air conditioning unit, the Physical Plant has had to slip $50,000 to $59,000 out of its operating budget.

"That money will probably be lost," he remarked. "It will fix the air conditioning now, but it will likely fail again in a year or less."

He said that the infrastructure problems now faced by colleges and universities across the country can be traced back to the baby boom generation, and the explosion of construction projects undertaken by colleges across the country between 1960 and 1975 to meet growing student populations. While those buildings were financed in their construction, Widener said, they were not allocated money for their maintenance and repair. As the buildings near the 30 to 45-year age mark, he said, repairs become more crucial, resulting in the kind of crunch being felt now at UMass, inside FAC and many other buildings.

"We may see the closure of buildings if these problems continue," Widener said.

He said that the state has also issued a mandate saying that tuition prices cannot increase, and that this has blocked further paths to finance repairs with taxpayer money already tight. It seems nonsensical, he said, but pointed out, "what I like or don't like is not a consideration here."

He asked rhetorically of students as consumers, "Would you rather have an economical education or the air conditioning working in the Fine Arts Center?"

Heather Curley had an answer. "I'd pay for air," she said.

political and emotional stake in the Middle East, Klare began to take questions from the audience. Members of the community gathered asked repeatedly what if anything Klare saw as an alternative to war. In response, Klare agreed that he supported movements seeking alternatives, but did not see the government headed in that direction.

"Air strikes are just a preload to the campaign in Afghanistan," he said. The war in Afghanistan against bin Laden and the Taliban will be the first phase according to Klare, the second phase will be a war against terrorism around the globe, targeting specific terrorist regimes; finally Klare sees a war against Iraq to topple Saddam Hussein as being the final item on the government's agenda.

"Do the job, get (Osama) bin Laden, and bring these forces home," Klare said.

In the wake of terror
Defining the media's role

The media rarely wins.

The job dictates objectivity, fairness and equal representation. For every story there are a hundred more. For every opinion fighting to be expressed, countless others, some rimarkably similar and others alarmingly different, wait in the wings. Newspapers, magazines, broadcast media – it all boils down to the same point: trying to concentrate an overwhelming amount of information and opinion into a bite-tized piece that will please every palate it touches.

That, however, though it is the ideal, is almost always the impossible. No matter how much time is spent on a story, no matter how many different stories you reach out to, no matter how diverse the sources you consult for those pieces, you're missing out on somebody, somewhere, and for that there's often Hell to pay.

Readers – and every member of the media is very much part of that group as well – react similarly when they're opinion isn't stated, or when too much of the opposing thought is. Most, then, act as they should: they write letters, they make phone columns, they get to the heart of what reporting for the people is essentially about: getting your voice heard.

Since September 11, we've seen millions of people worldwide exercise that right. Columns have been written and submitted to various publications. On-air programs, both radio and television, have fielded endless lines of concerned callers. Fortunately, it's a right we have as citizens.

Some individuals, however, take critical aim at those with different ideas. Rather than advocating discussion they pursue confrontation. How dare, they say, a newspaper I read publish a column I don't agree with? It's a plot, they'll tell you, between the readers and those employed by the paper to slant opinions, ignore the particulars of a story and mislead the public in a number of ways.

They're wrong.

No newspaper or media outlet is perfect, and few even come close. However, at the root of any publication with integrity is a desire to voice as many views a possible. When you read a column that you don't agree with in The Boston Globe, The New York Times and, yes, even the Daily Collegian, well...that's the point.

There are opinions other than your own out there. Unpopular opinions. Controversial thoughts. Contrary to what a lot of people feel, not every paper is in bed with the folks you so passionately dislike. It is no job of any newspaper or news source to hide ideas from you or anyone else in the same respect, no paper is obligated to run any submission, be it a letter or column.

The real danger in that lies with those who want to act as filters for the rest of us, who see any thought other than their own as inaccurate and dangerous. They pursue the insignificant, fight the small battles and blur the topic that sparked their anger in the first place.

Let's keep it on line and focused, taking into account the whole picture rather than just the piece we find pleasing for ourselves.

That spoiled stereotype still fits

SAM WILKINSON

If they, whoever they are, sold a bumper sticker that read "I hate Amherst College," I'd buy it. I mean that.

I'd buy it because, indeed. I do hate Amherst College. I hate them because I hate rich, white kids who never had to work a day in their life; who got where they are because their parents bought them a seat in whatever incoming class they are a part of. Instead of knowing what its like to have a job or responsibility, they sit at the country club, living a high life and getting an education that is automatically better than mine, apparently because they pay nearly four times more per year for I do. They view their own upbringing and cultural outlook as superior to my own. They think that by virtue of their parents' money they are better than I am. Their smarmy attitude says volumes about their stupid, gifted existence, and it all makes me sick.

Those were unfortunate, unprofessional, and unnecessary stereotypes. I should probably huddle in the corner of a poorly lit room, feeling guilty about the use of such wildly outrageous stereotypes. I should be wracked by a wrenching regret for my sin. If I've been taught one thing during my life, it's that stereotypes are bad. Baaaaaad.

Yet, I don't feel bad. I don't regret making stereotyped comments like that because, frankly, they aren't that harmful. But before I make my argument about the relative harm inflicted by those stereotypes, perhaps I should go over a few of the other ones I have.

-Most of the lefty, liberal, Naderites on this campus are horrifically uninformed about things like: "how the world works."

-Most Communication majors ignorantly follow Sut Jhally, even though 95 percent of his anti-corporate shtick is absolutely ridiculous, especially considering the huge paycheck he's pulling down. He drives a Volkswagen, a car originally designed for Nazis, and then goes on huge rants about how Israeli Jews are bad. He probably isn't an Anti-Semite; he just acts like it.

And even after all of that, it's like he's the Pied Piper. "If I make radical allegations about how bad corporations are, dumbass college students will follow..." He's made a career out of that.

-To revisit a popular favorite, Orchard Hill Commonwealth College (Commies!) students are Mountain Dew chugging, anti-social Snoodists. They'd rather study than enjoy life, they'd rather do Calculus than have fun.

I pick those three because those are stereotyped statements I've made before and some people, for some reason, have expressed frustration at my casual disregard for the individuals involved. And it's true. When I write things like that, I really am disrespecting large swathes of individuals with no real thought for the possible harm my words could have. There are times when I really regret the things I've written. It's being like Bill O'Reilly, on the O'Reilly factor, except with a conscience. Oh, and a brain.

I draw the line at taking heat for my stereotypes about Amherst College students. Most leftists on campus probably aren't ill-informed, but rather interested in the theoretical possibilities of the world rather than the practical realities. Maybe Sut Jhally isn't a vicious anti-Semite. Maybe all Commies aren't all Mountain Dew chuggers.

But Amherst College students are rich kids who get advantages in this world because of their money, not because of their relative intelligence. Last year, I wrote a column about a couple of AC students who didn't tip a waiter, then alleged racism when the waiter screamed at them for not leaving a tip. The Amherst Student, the AC college newspaper, made it into a huge deal, calling for a boycott of the restaurant involved. It was ridiculous. Rather than have the stories to reprimand the students for not leaving a tip, they attack the waiter for, oh, expecting a tip for his woefully underpaid work at the restaurant. I wrote about how unattached from society individuals have to be to not leave a tip.

People got angry with me for that. Disdaining AC students? Suggesting that their money directly lead to their ignorance? Suggesting that, because they'd never had a minimum wage job, they didn't really understand what it was like to not have money? Goodness gracious, such statements were sins on top of sins.

All I know is this: if the ongoing stereotype about me was that I was a filthy richie who'd never had to work a day in his life for anything he got, do you think I'd care? C'mon. That's a great stereotype for people to throw my way. Sure, people might not like me, but I can wipe my tears away on my hundred dollar bills. The fact of the matter is that a stereotype about the relative advantage that other people get because of a situation – their money, their resources, their whatever – is made by a person getting hurt, not because it's going hurt the person on the receiving end of the allegation.

Stereotypes that blacks are ignorant because of their skin color? That hurts blacks. It harms the ability to get hired, to get into schools, to get the same opportunities that others have come to expect.

Stereotypes that gays are wanton sex sluts? That hurts gays. It harms their ability to find social acceptance, to get jobs, and to have the same opportunities that others have come to expect.

Stereotypes about getting advantages because you are unbelievably wealthy? That doesn't hurt Amherst College students: it hurts because it is true.

Amherst College students have a better chance to succeed in the world because their parents bought them (or they possibly earned the opportunity in private schools that the average American cannot possibly afford...oh wait, that's money again) their place in the world. For whatever reason, an Amherst College education is valued more than a UMass education. And that's totally ridiculous.

The difference between UMass and Amherst College fundamentally is the number of students and the bill at the end of the year. The fact is that their Shakespeare, Argon and sociology is no different, no better, no more advanced, than ours. And so the only reason that Amherst College is seen is better than us is aesthetic.

The Lord Jeffs can take a stereotyped allegation like their only success is due to the inordinate amount of money that the students and their families have. At the end of the day, they aren't smarting from the fact that they are predominantly richer and better off than UMass students. They are doing well because they'll get advantages that the rest of us won't, simply because they could afford to be at a school that carries a certain prestige that only money can buy.

That's why I'd put that "I hate Amherst College" bumper sticker on the back of my car. Because I do. And I do so because those people aren't better people and yet the world will treat them as such. That stereotype doesn't hurt anybody. It just hurts.

Why not to grow up

ROB SCHULTZE

I just popped some zits.

I mention this not for the sole purpose of ruining your appetite (although that thought does bring me some wiseass glee) but to illustrate something that's kind of been bothering me.

Despite being a suave, mature college senior who has legally consumed a drink called a Dirty Girl Scout in a bar, lives in an apartment, almost finished two degrees and had a really, really hot date this past weekend I still have times when I don't feel even remotely like a grown-up.

Like when I pop one of my many, many zits. There's just something about that act that makes me feel thirteen again, with my greasy unwashed long hair and leather jacket and AC/DC shirt and tight blue jeans and bad attitude and atrocious skin and total lack of any sort of social life. When I was in high school, I figured that when I went to college my skin would clear up. Then I thought that maybe after I turned twenty-one. Now I'm having to face the realization that when I die the undertaker will most probably have to apply Clearasil to my body to make it acceptable for viewing.

Then there are the times when I'm watching cartoons in my bathrobe on Saturday mornings and giggling like a schoolgirl. I'm not ashamed to admit this – as far as I'm concerned, we are living in a new Golden Age of awesome animation on several different channels, and I'm happy to have the opportunity to enjoy all the quality programs. However, it's one thing to have a sort of postmodern, hip-nostalgia thing going for your cartoons, but that's not the way it is with me. My seven-year-old cousin Dylan and I have the same favorite TV show – SpongeBob Squarepants – for the exact same reason: it makes us laugh. Not a campy, it's-so-bad it's-funny chuckle, like pro-wrestling, but a simple, joyous heartfelt laugh because it is just SO DAMNED GOOD. It makes me happy. I don't question why.

"Is my love of The Powerpuff Girls only flourishing because of this academic institution and all the protections of idiocy that it provides?"

It is things like this – plus my love for taking walks to look at leaves, for desperately wanting to carve a pumpkin, for occasionally eating a whole bag of Tato Skins just because, for being afraid to ask the lady at the clothes store for help, for feeling safe when snuggling – that make me question just how grown up I have really become.

It confuses me because there are times when I feel very mature indeed. These are the times when I'm in class debating things like the ethics of letting a source buy you dinner, or when I'm at work setting deadlines for other students, or when my Corolla craps the bed and I take it to the shop, or when I try to decide where I should live and what I should do after graduation, or when I worry about being able to pay my electricity bill, or when I go grab a drink with friends. Then I think I might have more in common with my dad than anyone else, a truly frightening thought indeed.

It's a strange contradiction, but I suppose it was inevitable. College itself is a sort of a session of protracted adolescence and forced growth. We act like children and talk like adults, or vice versa, and there are no real consequences to either. But is that really the whole story? Is my love of The Powerpuff Girls only flourishing because of this academic institution and all the protections of idiocy that it provides?

I'd like to think that when I do get out of here I won't lose my whimsy and my sense of humor. I'd like to think that I'll still enjoy Tato Skins and beer while watching the Bruins. I hope that I don't leave my affection for pretty leaves and my desire for a good, all-American snuggle in the dust when the real world decided to knock me down and punch me in the kidneys until I pee blood.

I like to think that those childish things are as much a part of me as a hunger for responsibility and a drive to succeed, which will certainly serve me well in the great post-collegiate yonder. I want to believe that I'll never let simple joy get ground out of me by the weight of real life. I want to know that no matter how old I get I'll still sometimes be a pissed-off thirteen-year-old and a happy, Transformers-loving eight-year-old, sometimes at the same time.

Who says that immaturity is a vice? The cold-hearted people who can't stand to see anyone happy when their lives are so empty and work-obsessed are the ones who try to label things which cause happiness as something to be avoided or outgrown. I hope to never join their ranks.

Although, I must confess that I would be thrilled if I never got another zit. Some parts of youth are definitely better left behind, especially if they involve pus.

So sue me, I'm a Catholic

DAN LAMOTHE

I've always been different. In a time where no one really knows what the term "family" means anymore, my upbringing must look like something out of the 1960's. Dad's got the middle management job in a large aerospace firm. Mom's the stay-at-home caretaker that cooks, cleans, and makes sure my younger brothers do their homework. Over and over, I hear the same things. People consider my family quaint, goofy.

I've got no issues with it. I'm a square. I'm the guy that went to Catholic school through grade school and actually paid attention to some of what I learned there. I don't steal. I don't smoke weed. I work 8 hours a day on the weekend, so I don't party much. I've got no issues with that, I'm comfortable with my life. I could write about how tortured my childhood was and my life is, but the bottom line is that I'm a happy kid, and 95 percent of the time I'm having a good old time with my life.

Nevertheless, I've always felt like I stick out. My Catholicism shouldn't be that much of a sticking point with people. After all, there are millions of Catholics in America. Still, I often feel like it is. People look at me weird whenever this little word pops up in conversation: "CHURCH." It's a harmless enough word, but it sends shivers down a lot of people's spines. "Sure, I'll be there, but I'm going to hit church up for mass before I get there," I'll say on a Saturday afternoon, or "It's time for me to hit the sack, I'm going to church in the morning," at one o'clock on Saturday night.

The first time someone hears it, I can almost see the look of shock on his or her face. "HE goes to church???" the look says. "But he seems... so...so...NORMAL!"

Well, I AM normal. Ninety percent of us are. I'm not that sissy little white-boy that a lot of people picture when they envision the religion. I've been in my share of trouble, and I've done things and acted in ways that I'm not that proud of. I don't thump bibles, ok? I've just been brought up in a religion and it means something to me, that's all. I used to be an altar boy and (GASP) I still sing in church every now and then when the time is there. I was a choirboy back in the day, so true me. Lock me up and give me one of those cool white jackets that will lock my arms up by my sides already. I'll babble my life away and be happy with it. It's not like I wasn't doing the babbling anyway.

"I don't thump bibles, ok? I've just been brought up in a religion and it means something to me, that's all."

When I played high school basketball junior and senior year, I was probably one of five or six kids out of the twenty-five on JV and varsity who didn't do some form of drugs or drink like a fiend. Not surprisingly, my brother was one of the others. It could have been the same family influence or something, I think.

Sitting in the locker room those days, I basically developed the rest of my sense of self. The team listened to rap music. I listened to Creed, Van Halen, and Pearl Jam. The team hit keggers on weekends. I worked until nine at night and then hit the bowling alley or pool hall with some friends. The team talked about which girls they had "been with" over the weekend. I smirked, because I knew that was something I didn't really want like that. I used to think I was a thirty year-old trapped in a seventeen year-old's body. Now I know better. I just always had different priorities.

Going away to college certainly didn't help. "Dude, why won't you smoke weed with us?" I hear. It's a pretty simple answer, really. "I ain't down with the stuff, bro." I'll tell them. It's just not me, you know? I go to parties when the time is there, but there are just some things that I won't try. I'm not down with the cheeba, the happy-grass, the reefer, the super sassafras, pot, bubonic chronic, or whatever else people enjoy these days. I don't judge people who do it, but it's not me.

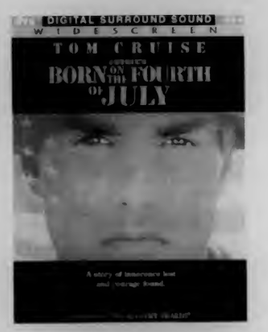
Working isn't much better for it sometimes. "Dude, you should pop pills (ecstasy) with me sometime. It'll be fun," one of my friends and co-workers at the grocery store will suggest.

"Sorry dude, not my thing," I'll say. After a while, people stop asking. They know better. They're still my friends, and we still have a good time while we work. We do different things when we're off the clock, though. As long as we respect each other there's never any problems with it.

Don't get me wrong. Being a decent guy with a heart has its downsides. I don't pick up numbers at the frat very often, you know? Not that it's a problem, but I've spent a fair share of time single. I'm looking for something good to come along, I guess.

At first I was leery of writing something like this, something that exposed so much of me to, oh, say the 20,000 people that will probably read this. Then I thought about it. Why hide who I am? I've been the same honest, decent, wisecracking jackass for years. Just like every other week that I write, this column is me. I don't sugarcoat stuff anymore. I tell it how it is for me. If it makes me vulnerable to criticism, so be it.

The older I get the more I worry. I see friends and loved ones falling by the wayside lost, and I wonder what will happen to them. I've already lost several people I know to drunken driving. I've already seen the anger and arrests turn friends in directions I never thought that they would go. When I go back to high school to watch my old team play, I sit in the stands with classmates who have dropped out of school after they've had kids with one another. How will things be for them?



I watch as a friend makes plans to join the Army, then has life pull the rug out from under him when he gets caught and arrested with a smoking bowl, pills, and other drug paraphernalia on a Saturday night. He gets probation out of it. No more army, and no college or school either. I wonder how that part-time job at Stop and Shop will be when he's 35.

In the end life is difficult because we can only plan for ourselves. I'd like to think that I'm doing everything I can do to be a success in life and be happy with my future. I can't keep people I care about from making decisions that could hurt them, and often that hurts. People have to care enough about themselves to do that.

War and the media: Tinseltown pitches in

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

As the Sept. 11 tragedy continues to send reverberations across America, the entertainment world remains steadfast in its crusade to help the surviving victims and their families.

LATEST BENEFITS

The latest big-benefit concert to be announced is "United We Stand," which will be held on Oct. 21. 'N Sync and the Backstreet Boys will bury the hatchet (for now at least) and perform at the same show. Other performers scheduled for the eight-hour show at Washington, D.C.'s RFK Stadium will include Michael Jackson, Aerosmith, James Brown, Mick Jagger, Kiss, Ricky Martin, Al Green, Carlos Santana, Bon Jovi, matchbox twenty, Aaron Carter, and the Goo Goo Dolls. (Previous reports stating Britney Spears will also appear have been nixed, as the teen starlet will apparently be prepping for her fall tour on that date.)

Jagger, Bon Jovi, and the Goo Goo Dolls are also among those scheduled to play the night before at The Concert For New York, the benefit headlined by Paul McCartney at Madison Square Garden.

In addition to headlining next weekend's benefit concert, Paul McCartney will donate all proceeds from his new single "From a Lover to a Friend," to the families of firefighters who died at the World Trade Center. "I have great admiration for the courage those guys showed," said McCartney, whose father was a volunteer fireman, in a statement. "I hope that the sales of this new single will help raise money for the firemen and the families."

A benefit compilation featuring artists like Bruce Springsteen, Bob Dylan, John Mellencamp, Celine Dion and Mariah Carey will be released on Oct. 16. The album, God Bless America, will contain artists performing patriotic or spirited American songs. The record will contain 15 tracks, and much of the proceeds will go to the Twin Towers Fund, which helps the families of police officers, firefighters, EMS workers and other city employees who lost their lives Sept. 11 assisting in the rescue effort at the World Trade Center. Dion has recorded a new arrangement of the title track. Live tracks have been contributed by Springsteen & the E Street Band, who play "Land of Hope and Dreams," and Mellencamp, who performs an acoustic version of "Peaceful World."

MTV is in the process of wrapping up three all-star video remakes of Marvin Gaye's "What's Going On." The new videos for the song: the "Main Mix," Jermaine Dupri's "R&B Mix" and Mick G's "Adult Contemporary Mix," are being directed by Jake Scott and will replace the current version, which was put together by MTV and blends news footage from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks with scenes from the recording sessions. The video has been put in heavy rotation since its first airing nearly a month ago.

The new videos will feature the artists removing blindfolds, which are imprinted with such labels as "Woman," "Homosexual" and "Muslim," while they sing their parts of the song. The blindfolds in the videos are meant to symbolize how people are blind to dealing with issues concerning racism, sexism, homophobia and religion and need to be more open-minded.

The original remake by the Bono-led Artists Against AIDS Worldwide will be released Oct. 30 on a benefit CD alongside a growing number of alternate versions now totaling nine. Half of the proceeds will go to the Global AIDS Alliance, while the remainder will go to the United Way's September 11 Fund.

Some of the filmmakers who craft tales of violence and terrorism for Hollywood are helping the US Army prepare for possible future terrorist attacks by brainstorming terrorist plots against American targets. The group was assembled through the Institute for Creative Technologies, a University of Southern California think tank that works on virtual training programs for the Army. Although the Army does not know if the terror-

Tremors of war will reach silver screen

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

If history is any indication, the movie industry will be affected by the new "War on Terrorism" that our country is engaged in. The images that come onto the big screen are no accident. Movies that display patriotism will likely become abundant, and ones that don't likely won't even be made. The last few wars our country has engaged in paint an interesting picture as to where movies and war movies are headed.

War movies that paint a positive picture of the U.S military can do wonders to persuade public opinion. Just last summer Pearl Harbor was seen by millions of Americans, opening over Memorial Day weekend. The film hardly did justice to the real issues of World War II or the huge amounts of suffering and sacrifice that occurred in it. Instead, it glorified war.

If the "War On Terrorism" is indeed going to be a long term war similar to the Cold War, then looking at movies that were made during the Cold War about the Cold War will probably tell the story of where the war movie genre will be headed in the near future.

Movies that painted Americans as good and Soviets as bad were plentiful during the Cold War. Maybe it was because Reagan's hand was on the trigger, but several films that were made during the 1980's dealt with nuclear war. The Day After and The Testament both released in 1983 showed horrific depictions of nuclear holocaust. Is it just a coincidence that these movies were made during a time when the U.S was expanding its military budget to combat the Russians?

After the Cold War came an influx of movies that still used the Russia versus U.S theme. Films such as The Hunt For Red October (1990) and Crimson Tide (1995) went back to the Cold War for their storylines. Again, these films came at a convenient time. While Americans might have started feeling secure with the absence of the Soviet Union, they were hit with these images that show the U.S in danger at the hands of a foreign nation.

While images in film can serve to alter public opinion, the images that are not shown can also. Just prior to the start of our involvement in the Persian Gulf in 1991, Born On The Fourth of July was scheduled to be shown on network television. The movie was pulled from the schedule prior to its airing due to its decidedly anti-war theme. The movie, starring Tom Cruise, depicts a crippled Vietnam veteran during his traumatic post war years. A movie like this one, which depicts the suffering and horror of war, was not welcome. Perhaps it was too real simply because it didn't have the usual rah rah, fight war, happy ending that many war movies do.

Films that rise above the usual war cliches usually come out years after the conflict that they depict. Born On The Fourth of July (1989) and Platoon (1986), both Oliver Stone films, came out during a time when Vietnam was a distant memory for many. It's not as if the films are simply "anti-war," it's just that the films manage to show a far more accurate depiction of war than a movie like Pearl Harbor does. One can only imagine what kind of reaction these films would have gotten had they been made during the height of The Vietnam War.

It's not as if this is all a conspiracy between the U.S government and the movie industry. Perhaps it just means that the public simply does not want anti-war movies, especially during war times. Still, since the movies do have an effect on so many, the messages they send about war cannot be ignored.

Kurt's Adidas shoes are tough to fill. Tuesday, the Pole-sky earned himself a new nickname – gone is the old "Nature Boy" for he shall hereby be known as "Couture Boy." Critics (or Sam) acclaimed his hostile take-over of my Style File column as brilliant – setting the bar high for my one-time stint as the Television Dictator, TV? Not my forte... but in the immortal words of Kurt "Couture Boy" Polesky (and in his self-loving style), "Shauna, your sense of style goes beyond the bejeweled borders of the fashion industry. Perhaps with your knack for knowing the right answer about everything, you can set this crazy world straight. If only everyone had a little more Shauna in their personality, there would be no drugs, no bombs, and no war." Kurt will take back Tube Notes next week, but for now - this one's for the little people, and this one's for you, Kurt. Here we go - the 8 most influential television shows in my life – or "how to be more like Shauna with a little audio-visual assistance:"

1. Sesame Street – A given on any list of influential programs is "The Street," as my peeps (my peeps being a one-armed baby doll and several jelly smudged Barbies) and me used to call it. Not only did I learn key Spanish words like "Agua" that will take me anywhere I want to go, but I also learned that "Danger is No Stranger" and the proximity of "Near" and "Far." This segment of Tube Notes was brought to you by the letters b and S. tB...S. B.S. BS. Hmmm... true dat.)

2. Dawson's Creek – This show should just be called Sesame Street for Big People. Once "The Street" teaches you your letters and numbers, you're ready for the thesaurus stylings of Dawson's. Forget going to Kaplan for SAT and GRE prep-courses. Flick on the WB, and they'll teach you all those big words you always wanted to use (and never knew how. "Pedantic" and "Terpsichorean" – I'll give you a moment while you go dig out the dictionary. Then there are the advanced plot lines – Sesame Street said it was okay to cry. Dawson's Creek said it was okay to cry when your ex-boyfriend turns out to be gay and his sister is checking into a mental institution. Kids - they just grow up so fast.

3. TLC's Afternoon Lineup – Why would you ever need to leave your room when you can live vicariously through TLC's afternoon shows? Instead of leading a life of your own, watch others go out on The Dating Story, get married on The Wedding Story, have a baby on The Baby Story, and get buried on The Funeral Story. Okay, so the last one isn't actually a program... YET. The Baby Story has played a major role in my life – it makes me see that "bobbing for nipples" (by the nipples, you sickos!) probably isn't the best party game at a baby shower and that as good as having your baby at home sounds, it's just not right to give birth in a kiddie pool in your living room.

4. seaQuest DSV – Sigh! That Jonathan Brandis (or should I say "Lucas Wolenczek" was just so damn hot. He was my first crush. I used to secretly buy BOP magazines to garner information about him for Christ's sake. I still know that his dad's name is Greg and that his favorite color is blue. It's just sad really.

5. The Frugal Gourmet – Along with this show, I'd like to add This Old House and Julia Child. Thanks to these shows, I used to avoid our television like the plague on weekends and weekday afternoons. The only thing more painful for me than watching these shows was regrouting the shower (which I actually did do at the age of eleven. Child labor laws, what?). So, on the afternoons that my mom flicked on Channel two, I ran fast and far to play strange games by myself which usually involved sticks and an invisible person named Avgon. Thank you PBS for forcing me to use my imagination, and for making me the person I am today - a girl who can amuse herself with a block of wood for hours upon hours.

6. Sherlock Holmes – Paranoia is my middle name (unless I'm playing Softball, because then my middle name is "Motherf*&king"), all because of the night I woke up and went downstairs to witness a grizzly murder on the Sherlock Holmes show my parents were watching. As a child I spent my summer nights sweltering under a sheet, because I figured the murderers wouldn't be able to find my heart to cut it out. Okay, fine, you win – I still can't sleep without a sheet. This ridiculous fear of being murdered Sherlock Holmes style led to my mom having to reveal the truth about Christmas at the ripe old age of five, because I refused to sleep until I knew if a knife-wielding maniac would climb down the chimney like Santa could. Writing this, I begin to wonder if I might want to seek some professional help.

7. Reading Rainbow – Not only can I go anywhere or do anything, just by taking a look, in a book (with Reading Rainbooowwww) - but I also learned from this show how NOT to write a paper, column or review. Please read the following quote in a bizarre monotone children-of-the-corn voice, and you'll understand what I'm talking about: "If you want to know what finds out next, you'll have to read the book..." English and Journalism majors alike are shuddering in horror.

8. MTV's The Real World – My mom was always lenient with us as children. We could someday be anything we wanted except for one thing - an underwear model. If my mom could revise that statement now, I think that she'd add on a member of the Real World cast. You'd think that in the ten years that it's been on TV, people would have caught on by now that if you go on that show you are going to look like an idiot. When people stop being polite and start getting real you can't help but have ridiculous brawls about the disrespect of scooping peanut butter from the jar with your fingers. And you're bound to be caught on tape singing inane songs like "Come on be my baby tonight...I know 'bout the other thugs you've been with, come on be my baby tonight." Oh the shame of it all. Where were/are these people's mothers to warn them? Next thing you know, they'll all be in Jockey ads.

Thank you TV, for making me the prolific (yeah, get that dictionary again) and well-adjusted person I am today. Now, if you'll excuse me – I need to crawl under my comforter so that no one will cut my heart out.

UMass workers display inspiring art

By Cassandra Montalvo
Collegian Correspondent

Walking through UMass campus, one sees hundreds of different people from different backgrounds; all have their own story. But the people with the most interesting stories are also the ones who are well hidden and almost forgotten about. Worked into the background of the campus and campus life, the staff, maintenance workers, secretaries, food service workers, trades workers, and technical workers are the invisible backbone of UMass.

Tony Deni is one of these workers. Spending his evenings in Bartlett Hall, he cleans the classrooms and hallways that are usually filled with students and professors. Like most workers, he is seen as a shadow, as someone whose life seemingly revolves around his job. But speaking with him for only a few minutes, a love for art emerges, along with the realization that he's more than he seems.

Over anything else, art is his preferred form of expression. "Art is interesting in the sense that it gets its power in color," he explains. "When paint adheres to its own laws, it attracts a tremendous power."

Growing up and attending school in Holyoke, his love for color and painting began during high school. After he graduated his family's lack of money for college and other priorities forced him to give up his art for many years. For twenty-five years he labored on the Boston-Maine Railroad that runs through West Springfield before settling down to work at UMass. Once he began working at Bartlett Hall, some 14 years ago, his passion was rejuvenated. Spending a great deal of time on the Art History floor, one night he met Professor Kristine Haney. After many conversations with her and numerous other faculty and students, his love was reborn and he was once again inspired to paint.

This week his work will be displayed at the "We Are More Than You See, Part III" exhibition in the Student Union Gallery. With about ten planned pieces, most from someone or something at UMass that inspired him, he's going into this with a purpose.

"I'm entering my art hoping that it can present an equal point of interest with all classifications of service at the University (faculty, staff, students, and workers). Maybe it can influence their interest in and attraction to art."

Mama brings back ABBA

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

MAMA MIA!
Playing at The Colonial Theatre – Boston, MA
And the Winter Garden Theatre – New York, NY

Ever since the Broadway phenomenon of RENT, musical theatre has flourished with rock n' roll. Apart from the Cole Porter or Rogers & Hammerstein revivals, the new sound of music on The Great White Way is electric guitars, powerhouse drums and straining vocals.

Obviously, it would only be so long before there was a disco musical. In 1999, Saturday Night Fever was adapted to the stage, featuring many of the BeeGees' greatest hits. It failed to win any major awards or critical praise, and the disco trend seemed over before it even began. Now there is Mama Mia!, an outstanding new musical made up of songs from the 70's super-group ABBA.

The endearing show is filled to the brim with memorable songs, almost to the point of being too much. In fact, if there is any problem with Mama Mia!, it's that there is too much music. The average musical has somewhere between 15 and 17 songs. Once past those numbers, the show ventures towards opera territory. Mama Mia! would not have been as charming and attractive as it is if the smart and witty dialogue was scrapped to fit the rock-opera format. Rather, there are so many likeable musical numbers in the show, that just as one is sinking in another song starts up.

The outcome is that only a bunch of the 24 songs stick with you permanently, while the others you were bombarded with unfortunately fall by the wayside. If the show had a less frequent lapse into music and was only comprised of, say, 15 tunes, they all would most certainly linger longer than they do in the production's current state.

With all of the music contained in the show, it is a marvel to see how each song appropriately fits the delightful story. After all, not even one of the tracks was written explicitly for the show – Mama Mia! is rather a collection of ABBA's greatest hits from the height of their career, woven into one story. Everything from "Dancing Queen" to "Money, Money, Money" is covered, plus, of course, the show stopping title tuner.

The refreshing plot centers on 20-year-old Sophie Sheridan, living with her young, single mom on an island off of Greece. Sophie is about to get married, but wants to find out whom her father is so he can walk her down the aisle. After reading her mother's diary, she narrows it down to three candidates, an Australian Outbacker, a British businessman, and an American nobody.

When Sophie's mama, Donna, is reunited with the flames of her past, there are hilarious results. The mystery of who is Sophie's real father starts to unfold, but each character has become so dynamic and liked, that one yearns for the impossible result of them all being her dad. Suffice to say, playwright Catherine Johnson casts a magical spell over the audience and what eventually does prevail is not so far from miraculous after all.

Every actor in the cast gives a first-rate performance, which makes this production of Mama Mia! so welcoming and viewer-friendly. Dee Hoty truly shines in her role as Donna, and it is a guess as to keep up. She carries at least a dozen of the show's huge musical numbers, her voice never wavering and her energy always strong. Her talent is further exemplified by the huge array of emotion she covers in the course of the two-and-a-half hours, and she deserves every last amount of applause she garners. Her performance is uniformly matched by everyone else in the cast, from the ensemble swing to her fellow Broadway veterans sharing the limelight with her.

Trying to avoid the exorbitant costs that usually befall Broadway theatre, Mama Mia! operates off of one rotating set. It's simple and to the point, and doesn't distract from the real allure of the show which is the flashy musical numbers and comedic scenes. The scenery and lighting is convincing that it is actually set on a peaceful and quiet Greek island, whether it be the basic look of the buildings and the lights casting a watery canopy around the set. What is seen on the stage is just as bright as what is heard coming off of it.

Mama Mia! got its start in London and became a sold-out sensation. While the production currently playing in Boston will continue on its U.S. tour with another new cast in the Broadway premiere, Mama Mia! has what it takes to become the next big thing. With so much tragedy and sadness both in the world now and often times as the subject matter of musical theatre, Mama Mia! is a guilt-free pleasure to be thank ful for.

Mama Mia! will be at Boston's Colonial Theatre until October 28th, with performances beginning in New York on October 18th.

X-Men finally cool again

For as long as I can remember, Marvel Comics' X-Men has been the best-selling comic on the market. But like in all media, the top of the heap was also the most mind-numbingly mediocre, self-indulgent, and incestuous garbage on the racks. For some reason the books, which at times were physically painful to read, outsold all the quality comics. But now it can finally be said that the X-Men comic books, specifically New X-Men by writer Grant Morrison and artist Frank Quitely, deserve to be king of the hill.

It is immediately clear from looking at the new uniforms, logos, and direction of the book that Morrison and company had similar feelings about the book in the past. He makes no secret that his inaugural storyline (New X-Men, #114-116), "E for Extinction," is a clean break from the convoluted and often embarrassing past.

Wisely, he uses the success of last summer's feature film based on the merry mutants, emulating many of the elements that director Bryan Singer brought to the mythos. For instance, the team turns in their ridiculous brightly colored tights for loose-fitting, practical uniforms. Also, he refocuses attention to the main foundation of what the X-Men is all about. This particular story revolves around the struggle for a species—the mutants—to survive as an unknown enemy tries to eradicate them from the face of the Earth. Opening up the story with a look at the struggles between the Cro-Magnon Man and the Neanderthal sets the tone perfectly, pitting the team against natural selection itself. The idea that the X-Men are activists trying to create a peaceful union between both humans and mutants was lost somewhere long ago among the soap opera excesses of the past few years and it is nice to see Morrison make this fundamental element of the book prominent again.

Rather than all speaking in the same, cliched voice—as many of the past writers had the characters do—Morrison returns the vibrant individuality to the characters. Professor X is the wise "father" of the team; Wolverine is the edgy and somewhat enigmatic member; Cyclops is the "eerily calm" field leader under pressure; Jean is the pacifist. All these classic characters have been returned to their rightful place but have been supplemented by a few fresh changes. A former X-Men villain Emma Frost, forever changed after the catastrophic events of the story, joins the cast. Her cold-hearted repartee with the rest of team was an ingenious edition to the book and Morrison makes her likable while still maintaining the "ice queen" exterior that made her such a great villain.

And the trademark strengths that Morrison is known for are in the book. The big, crazy ideas that seem too bizarre to be convincing but are anchored by the thoughtful and dynamic characterization. They pseudo-science of the world that these mutants live in is pure poetry through Morrison's eyes. The newly evolved Beast talks about the side effects of his latest metamorphasis, explaining that he now has the hormones of "a Hindu sex goddess." It is these bizarre, unorthodox looks at what are ultimately corporate properties that made Morrison such an overwhelming success at DC Comics, when he wrote JLA (Justice League America) and made it one of their hottest and most innovative books. He works the same magic here.

But this time Morrison has the advantage of having a much better artist.

Frank Quitely is one of the few artists working in the industry today who can do justice to the "widescreen" vision those Morrison projects. Also, he was a nice departure from the trendy and often mediocre artists who preceded him; his unique style has turned off many diehard X-fans but they do not know pure craftsmanship when they see it. Seldom is a comic artist able to capture the quiet scenes as well as the big, earth-shattering ones. His sense of storytelling, through the panel layout, takes on a cinematic aura that is never boring.

Finally, X-Men is cool to read again. And it is such a departure from its checkered past that they decided to re-christen it New X-Men. Because though it returns the elements that made it such an appealing concept, it still moves forward. Morrison says his future plans, especially in light of the World Trade Center disaster, will show that "New X-Men is very much a pacifist futurist comic, as will become more apparent over the next few issues." I look forward to seeing how Morrison gets there.

ist scenarios will prove useful, because it takes several months to over a year for such projects to be completed, the military remains confident that screenwriters and producers are creative people who may come up with fascinating ideas very quickly.

"In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, the Army and USC's ICT have worked together to coordinate ongoing panel discussions with some of Hollywood's top talent," the center said in a statement Tuesday.

Other contributions have already been hatched in the past few weeks. Most notably, a Michael Jackson led tribute song that is said to have helped raise $50 million dollars for survivors and families of the victims. And a TV telethon that ran a few weeks ago was watched by over 80 million viewers and raised a staggering $150 million.

THE SHOW MAY GO ON

The entertainment world continues to feel executive pressure as the aftermath and an uncertain future create difficult decision-making at the last minute. A decision on whether the twice-cancelled Emmy's will be aired may possibly come as soon as today after the Academy of Television Arts & Sciences' executive committee meeting. The Academy is currently planning to stage the awards show on a California military base before a live audience of soldiers. Another option is to tape the show without a live audience and air it sometime in November (probably on the 11th or 18th). The goal is to settle on a ceremony and location that would be unaffected by outside events. The Emmy's were cancelled Sunday night after United States and Britain launched air strikes on Afghanistan. The show was first cancelled Sept. 16 after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

TOURS CANCELLED

The tragic circumstances and fear of overseas safety also forced Janet Jackson and Weezer to cancel European tours, opting instead to finish and play more U.S. dates before the end of the year. "If anything happened to anyone on this tour, I could never forgive myself," Jackson said in a statement issued on Oct. 1. "My European fans are among the most loyal, and I was very excited to share this show with them. I have agonized over this decision." Other artists and bands are also considering canceling or postponing future worldwide tours due to safety concerns of large groups of tour personnel.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – A partnar or loved-ona may express some doubts today regarding an upcoming step you are planning to take. But what do they know? Go on and get that dragon tattooed across your back. It's sexy!
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Go about your business in a quiet, unassuming mannar today, and tomorrow you're sure to win the acclaim of many. You've got something few enjoy.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Someone close to you will display his or her true colors today and challenge both your opinion and your loyalty. Fight for this friendship or don't because you know you have way too many friends to count as it is.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – This is a good day to test your skills against those acclaimed as experts. You may discover that you're in the running for handsome rewards or not. This may not be the best week to go on The Price is Right.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can achieve a great deal today – at least on a preliminary basis. Preparation at this time can lead to rewards in the near futura. You know that ginormous jar of peanut butter your mom gave you come in useful as a bookend.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may find yourself considering a fight with City Hall today. Go and protest that your water isn't clean.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You must trust in your own creativity today to steer you clear of certain pitfalls that familiarity and boredom may present to you at this time. And when that guy tries to hit you with his bike and doesn't stop to make sure you're okay, just grunt in disbelief.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – All eyes are on you today, and it may be up to you to carry others across the threshold of accomplishment. You're well prepared for this! And when you've achieved your goal, take your followers out for ice cream. They love that kind of thing.

had a tough year last season, as a knee injury caused him to miss 10 games last season, posting his smallest point total in his UMass career. But, according to Cahoon, just coming back to the lineup after such an injury was an impressive feat in itself.

"I challenge anybody to say they could have got themselves through the surgery, through the rehab and back on the ice any faster," he said. "He played through that difficulty and that setback without losing a beat."

Both defensemen play a critical role on the power play, an area that the Minutemen have struggled in over the past few years. Last year, the Maroon and White's man-advantage connected at a below-average 15.2 percent last year, including a stretch over its final nine games where it went one-for-32.

"We'll have two groups [on the power play] and they'll be in different groups so that we can bring some balance to both groups," Cahoon said. "Toni is more of the playmaker back there and Sami's a little bit more hectic. He's really terrific at getting the puck up ice and keeping the puck in the zone and he'll get down low and get involved in securing possession of the puck. They both complement their groups and they're very different in what they do but they both are important ingredients to the power play."

To Soderholm, the key to improving the extra-man is simple – simplification.

"It's down to the point where we are going to simplify things a little bit, and just get as many shots as we can," he said. "We have to outwork the other guys too – just because we have an extra player doesn't mean we don't have to outwork them."

"Last year I think that our biggest problem was that we didn't get shots on net and we tried to do a little too much with the puck so we just have to simplify the power play," Jalkanen agreed.

But despite the fact that both Finns play critical roles in the Minuteman offensive system, defense is the first priority for them.

"Our job is to let forwards attack and to cover their behinds," Soderholm said. "Any time there is a chance, I'm going to go for it, but I have to make sure that the defensive side of the puck is covered."

"Every game they rescue me from being embarrassed by other teams," said Johnson, who will be much dependent on the defense in his role as a first-year starter.

Yet for both players, participating in college hockey is only part of the equation. The experience of simply living their lives in America remains unparalleled.

"It's been great to see all the campuses and as much of the country as we've seen," Soderholm said. "Just being a part of that helps you a great deal with anything you do."

And so, the two toddlers have grown into full-scale adults, primed to be a success in the world. Four thousand miles and 23 years later, the two defensemen have found their position in life.

Hockey East Preview: Friars, Black Bears top pack

Coach: Jerry York
2000-01 record: 33-8-2 (1st Hockey East)
Top returning scorers: Ben Eaves (13g, 26a)
Jeff Giuliano (14g, 22a)

What an offseason the defending national champions had. After losing five key seniors to graduation, underclassmen Krys Kolanos, Chuck Kobasew and Brooks Orpik decided to jump ship for the NHL. What that spells is BC losing its top three scorers, top three defensemen and starting goaltender.

This could easily be a down year for the Eagles, but the fact that most expect them to fall off the face of the earth could play to their advantage. They still have super-freshmen Eaves and Tony Voce returning, and Giuliano and Ales Dolinar will provide good experience up front. BC will falter a little offensively, but the key will be defense, where junior Bill Cass and the young but talented J.D. Forrest will be counted on to help out the netminders – the talented but unproven pair of Tim Kelleher and Finn Matti Kultanen.

Coach: Jack Parker
2000-01 record: 14-20-3 (6th Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Brian Collins (14g, 16a)
Mike Pandolfo (16g, 13a)

Last season was a dismal one for Parker's troops, their worst finish ever in Hockey East. Fortunately for them, the Terriers only suffered significant losses up front and brought in one of the top recruiting classes in the country, including three members of the US National Development Team.

Carl Corazzini and Dan Cavanaugh (first and fourth on the team in points, respectively) are the only major losses for BU, as it returns its top five defensemen, all of whom are a talented bunch. Senior mainstays Chris Dyment and Pat Aufiero will provide a solid front for the tandem of Sean Fields and Jason Tapp in net. Tapp posted a dismal .893 save percentage as the team's top netminder last year, and the team will need improvement from him to move up the ladder. Jack Baker and John Sabo must have better seasons up front, as they are the only experience at the position aside from Collins and Pandolfo.

Hockey East Rankings

1.) Providence
2.) Maine
3.) New Hampshire
4.) Boston College
5.) Boston University
6.) Northeastern
7.) UMASS
8.) Merrimack
9.) UMass-Lowell

Coach: Tim Whitehead
2000-01 record: 20-12-7 (2nd Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Martin Kariya (12g, 24a)
Michael Schutte (15g, 10a)
Niko Dimitrakos (11g, 14a)

The Black Bears have the biggest burden of any Hockey East team this season, as they will have to overcome the emotional impact of the death of their longtime coach and spiritual leader, Shawn Walsh. Taking the reins this year will be Tim Whitehead, who will serve as interim coach. Last season, Whitehead led an overachieving UMass-Lowell squad to a second round appearance in the HE Tournament.

The trio of top returning scorers has a wealth of talent and are plenty experienced. A healthy Dimitrakos could bring Maine to the top of the conference, as he missed 10 games due to injury last year. Kariya, a junior, shouldered the offensive load and should again be a force among HE snipers. Schutte is one of the top offensive defensemen in the league, and Matt Yeats may be the most solid netminder in the league.

Coach: Don Cahoon
2000-01 record: (8-22-4, 9th Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Tim Turner (16g, 10a)
Martin Miljko (12g, 10a)

The Minutemen finished only one point out of the conference playoffs last year, a disappointment in Don Cahoon's first season. However, this season's team sports a young look that could bring the team up the ranks of HE in the coming years.

The team features 11 freshmen and five members from each other class. Turner, Miljko and sophomores Thomas Pöck and Scott Horvath will be counted on to provide leadership and talent for the young forward core. The defense should be strong and experienced with stalwarts Sami Jalkanen and Toni Soderholm returning to lead the core. Mike Johnson provides talent and experience in the crease and should be a good influence on freshman Tim Warner. The bottom line is, if the talented but young forward core matures in the college game, this team could be a thorn in the side of HE's elite teams.

Coach: Blaise MacDonald
2000-01 record: (19-16-3, 5th Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Ed McGrane (17g, 20a)
Laurent Meunier (10g, 24a)

How can a team top a tremendously successful campaign that shocked the hockey world? In this case, UML probably can't.

After losing offensive leaders Brad Rooney and Kyle Kidney to graduation, coach Tim Whitehead left due to a contract dispute. And then, the River Hawks lost Ron Hainsey, possibly the conference's best defenseman last year, to the NHL.

All that spells a challenge for MacDonald, but he is certainly up for it. The Hawks have plenty of returning talent up front in the form of McGrane and French stars Meunier and Yorick Treille, but they will lose their French stars for up to 10 games for the Olympics. The loss of Hainsey might cripple the defense, which is experienced but not all that talented. That could be tough on backstop Jimi St. John, who played well down the stretch due to the play of Hainsey.

Coach: Chris Serino
2000-01 record: (14-20-4, 8th Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Anthony Aquino (17g, 25a)
Nick Parillo (16g, 13a)
Marco Rosa (6g, 18a)

Coach Serino is a fiery leader who brought the best out of his team in the last weeks of the regular season last year. His recently contracted cancer is the one thing that could be a hindrance to this young team on the rise.

Aquino, Rosa and Parillo formed one of the top lines in the conference, as Aquino bloomed as a sophomore and was taken in the third round of the NHL draft by the Stars. Rosa showed strongly in his freshman campaign and he too was taken by the Stars, in the sixth round.

On defense, the loss of captain Steven Moon will hurt the Warriors, as his punishing hits made him a force on the blue line. Sophomore Tony Johnson had a strong first year, but he may be looked to as the leader of the D. Joe Exter was one of the best freshmen in HE last year, as he improved down the stretch as a force in net.

Coach: Dick Umile
2000-01 record: 21-12-6 (4th Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Darren Haydar (18g, 23a)
Lanny Gare (11g, 20a)

The Wildcats had yet another strong season last year and will be returning their top five scorers and eight of their top 10 from last year. The catch is that they lost backstop Ty Conklin to graduation, who might have been the most valuable player to his team last season.

What that means is that UNH will completely switch their style of play to a more upbeat, offensive game – a situation that will benefit Haydar, whose numbers suffered in the defensive style played last season. He may be the top forward in Hockey East and is possibly the league's top Hobey Bakey candidate. Garrett Stafford is a strong two-way defenseman, who also will excel under the new system. Basically, the only question mark on the team is goalie Matt Carney, who performed well, but only appeared in five games last year.

Coach: Bruce Crowder
2000-01 record: (13-19-4, 7th Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Mike Ryan (17g, 12a)
Willie Levesque (15g, 10a)

Northeastern is the team that never moves up to the top level, but is always a tough team to beat. In Crowder's tenure, the Huskies are 7-1-3 against teams ranked No. 1 or No. 2 in the polls. The loss of senior leader Greg Mischler will leave a void to fill up front for NU. Ryan, now a junior, is one of the league's best shooters, and will certainly be looked to as the person who might be able to fill that void. The Huskies are relatively young at forward, with only three seniors up front, only two of which were in the top ten on the team in scoring last year.

Jim Fahey is one of the conference's top blueliners, and should be the emotional leader of the defense and the team. His experience will be welcome, as only three upper classmen return on defense. The biggest question on this young team is netminder Mike Gillhooly, who disappointed last year with a .880 save percentage.

Coach: Paul Pooley
2000-01 record: (22-13-5, 3rd Hockey East)
Top ret. scorers: Devin Rask (25g, 28a)
Peter Frege (16g, 21a)

Picked first in the HE preseason poll, the Friars will have to deal with being the favorite for the first time. Pooley took over a miserable squad in 1994 and brought it to new heights last season as it met up with BC in the tourney finals.

Up front, this team is as solid as any other and Rask is close to UNH's Darren Haydar in terms of Hobey Baker potential. Fregoe, Drew Omicioli and Marc Suderman help out, providing senior leadership up front. The team will miss senior co-captains Matt Libby and Jay Leach on defense, but sophomore Regan Kelly posted 25 points last year, and now that UML's Ron Hainsey has left for the NHL, he may be the best young defenseman in the conference. Nolan Schaefer, who posted a .915 save percentage as the starter last year, returns as one of the league's top talents between the pipes.

sport. After 10 years of international play, he retired from competition and relocated to the East Coast to pursue a graduate education at California-Santa Barbara. But it wasn't long before Davidson was bitten by the hockey bug again, and soon he was helping guide the programs at both UCSB and nearbys Cal-Poly.

But when it came time to look for a head coaching job at the D-I level, Davidson knew that the deck was stacked against him.

"Why take a man when there are 99 other women who can do the job?" Davidson said. "What would possess you to take a chance on a guy?"

Luckily for him, one athletic director was willing to take just that chance. Providence's Tammy Light Davidson gives much of the credit for his hiring at PC to his UMass field hockey pedigree.

"Coming from UMass, you're coming from a place that has a true legacy," Davidson said. "Everyone in the sport knows Pam Hixon, and Patty Shea was the best goalkeeper in the nation for years and years. You're talking about true students of the game."

Since taking the reins at Providence, Davidson has garnered rave reviews as a coach who truly listens to and responds to the needs of his players. Perhaps the best compliments come from Shea, who considers the Maroon and White's yearly date with PC to be one of its best games of the year.

"It is definitely an uphill struggle for men to coach in field hockey, and Bill has done an excellent job," Shea said. "He has had to fight against a lot of things down there at Providence, and I think the proof of how good he is comes from his team. We'll always play them, even if we have to go down there to do it."

As far as the additional obstacle that Davidson has had to overcome as a man in what is traditionally a woman's sport, Shea sees this as a double-edged sword. She acknowledges that she would "like to see more women coaching women" because of the bond that develops, but that a coach's effectiveness is in no way limited by things such as gender.

"The bottom line is that you want to see good coaches in the sport," Shea said.

As a matter of fact, the fifth-year skipper often contemplates what it would be like to be on the other side of the gender fence.

"Sometimes, I wish I coached men," Shea said. "You can just tell them what you feel, and it rolls right off their shoulders."

V-ball finds error of its ways at URI

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

No matter what the sport, a team's chances of winning a contest can be squashed in an instant by errors. Even one mistake can blur the line between triumph and defeat.

Such was the case for the Massachusetts volleyball team on Tuesday night. The Minutewomen were plagued by a multitude of mistakes in falling to a tenacious Rhode Island team, 3-0 in Kingston, R.I. The Rams forced the Maroon and White into 21 hitting errors, while UMass also self-inflicted some of the damage, giving away 14 points on service errors. When coupled with a fiery URI offense that was on top of its game, the mistakes spelled doom for the Minutewomen.

"It's really hard to have an offense when you don't pass well," Head Coach Bonnie Kenny said. "Whenever we had chances to capitalize, we put together a few good runs. But our offense was pretty non-existent."

URI shot out of the gates early in game one as it pumped out an early 17-9 lead. The Maroon and White reeled off three straight points, highlighted by kills from seniors Lauren Vander Veen and Lymarie Llovet, to cut the lead to 17-12. From that point on, however, the Rams took charge, and cruised to a 30-17 victory in the opening frame. Remarkably, the Kingston crew committed zero hitting errors in the first game for a .625 hitting percentage, while the struggling Minutewomen attack limped to a .074 percentage to start the match off, garnering only eight kills.

The second game saw the UMass attack catch a little bit more of a spark, as it went on a six-point run to take a 6-5 advantage, its first and only lead of the match. The Rams stampeded back and grabbed a 25-16 after four consecutive kills by star player Yolanda Bogacz. The Minutewomen came alive again, as Ilka Stehnova had two service aces to bring her team to within 28-25. But the Maroon and White's comeback fell short, as URI went to the locker room with a 30-28 win and a 2-0 lead.

Coming out of the break, the home team yet again continued its offensive flurry, jumping out to a quick 8-1 lead. The Minutewomen could not muster a significant rally until late in the game. With the Rams up 28-22, UMass forced a series of URI errors and received a Janeen DeMartie kill to cut the lead to within one at 29-28. However, Rhode Island closed out the game and the match at that point to send the Minutewomen back to Amherst with a losing record in the Atlantic 10 at 3-4.

"I thought they did a fine job offensively," said Kenny. "I think that was about as few digs as we've ever had.

"Yolanda Bogacz did what setters do; she dominated at the end of the match," she added. Bogacz led the Rams with a team-high 11 kills while hitting for an amazing .409 percentage.

DeMartie and Nitia Small led the UMass attack with eight kills apiece, while Lymarie Llovet slammed home six kills while contributing eight digs on defense. However, an anemic .109 hitting percentage for the match, along with 35 total service and hitting errors, ended up being the downfall of the Maroon and White.

"Nitia played all right the first couple games, but then they started keying in on her," said Kenny. "[URI] just has really good team and plays with really good chemistry."

The Minutewomen continue their quest toward an Atlantic 10 crown this Saturday when they travel to Pittsburgh to clash with Duquesne.

Pete Cariello gained a new perspective on life after suffering a potentially devastating neck injury in his last game with the Minutemen.

Pete Cariello has spent his career as a punisher. One fateful block taught him the role of victim.

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Pete Cariello is a hit man. He has made his name on the football field by burying people, first as a roving assassin at linebacker and later as a human steamroller at fullback.

In his last game with the Massachusetts Minutemen, Cariello got a grim reminder of the dangers of living by the hit. In the second quarter against conference rival Hofstra, No. 44 sprinted out of the backfield to deliver what should have been just another crushing block.

But this time, the number that came up was his.

"When you get hurt in this game, it's because it's your time. There's really nothing you can do to prevent it," said Cariello, who left the game on a stretcher en route to the emergency room after sustaining a neck injury on the fateful play.

The call was a toss to tailback Omari Howard; Cariello's job on the play was to take out Hofstra linebacker Andre LaBrutte. But as the 232-pound fullback lowered his head and plowed into his equally massive counterpart, something had to give. Cariello drove his shoulders though the No. 51 on LaBrutte's chest, but his helmet simply refused to follow. Instead his head was snapped upward with a jolt, and suddenly all 6-foot-1 of the Minuteman's frame went limp and crumbled to the turf.

"It was the weirdest feeling I've ever had," Cariello said. "My entire body just went numb, and for a couple of seconds I felt nothing."

As head trainer Jeff Smith rushed to Cariello's aid, the fullback began to slowly regain feeling in his body. The numbness was replaced with throbbing pain, which started at the back of the fifth-year senior's skull and shot down through his neck and shoulder into his left arm.

"Because of where [Cariello's] pain and discomfort were coming from, we knew that extra precautions should be taken," said Smith, who has accrued over 10 years of experience as an athletic trainer.

With his adrenaline still flowing from the thrill of the game, Cariello could think of nothing but shaking off the pulsing ache and getting back into action. Even as he was being strapped down onto a stretcher, the New York native didn't abandon hope that he would be back in the UMass huddle before halftime.

But then the words of Smith beside him began to sink in, particularly when the trainer uttered the words "nerve damage."

"The seriousness of [the injury] didn't hit me until I heard the doctor talking about me never playing football again," Cariello said. "Then I turned my head and saw my parents, and the look in my mother's eyes scared me. She's a tough woman, but there was a real look of fear when she saw me on that stretcher."

Meanwhile on the sideline, UMass head coach Mark Whipple was watching host Hofstra reduce his Minutemen to "a M*A*S*H unit," junior cornerback Anton McKenzie, playing before dozens of family and friends less than 50 miles from his hometown, made an early exit with a pulled hamstring. Long-snapper Jeremy Cain, making his first start since being injured in the season opener against William & Mary, barely had enough time to botch his first snap before returning to the Maroon and White gulag with a sprained ankle. Junior center Maikel Miret allegedly called a succession of incorrect plays before being diagnosed with a concussion.

By the time Cariello went down, Whipple had all but shifted gears from his original gridiron blueprint into Survivor mode.

"[Cariello] was going to be a big part of our game plan, and the next thing I know I hear in my headset that he's being taken to the hospital with a potentially serious neck injury," Whipple said. "I was just praying that we could make it to halftime with enough guys left to put on the field."

During the ambulance ride to Nassau County Medical Center, Cariello tried his best to fend off a chorus of voices in his head, telling him that his luck may have finally run out.

"All during that trip, I just kept going over in my head what it would mean to never play football again," Cariello said. "I started thinking about all these things that the coaches and doctors were telling me and hoping that my time wasn't up."

No. 44 was left with no other options but to wait. Initial x-rays revealed no structural damage to Cariello's spine, but he was slow to regain feeling in his left arm and doctors decided that further tests would be necessary. A magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) test conducted a few days later also came back negative, allowing Smith to rule out all but one very common football diagnosis.

"Pete's injury is what we refer to with the non-technical term 'stinger,' something that you see quite often in this sport," Smith said. "It's basically a case of a nerve in his neck getting stretched, something that could take up to 2-4 weeks to improve but shouldn't have any lasting effect on his ability to play football."

Cariello himself was relieved, albeit not entirely surprised, by Smith's diagnoses. It turns out that the senior had suffered a similar injury, not once but twice, dating back to a practice earlier in the summer. The nerve had flared up again in Week Four against Delaware, but the gritty fullback had played through the pain against the Blue Hens.

Nearly 12 days after being hospitalized in New York, Cariello still has yet to regain full strength or even feeling in his left arm. Smith has plans of fitting the fullback with a special protective collar to prevent reoccurrence of the injury, but that probably won't be necessary for at least a few more days.

Cariello has done some light running with his team as it prepares for Homecoming Weekend, knowing full well that his chances of taking the field at McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday against New Hampshire are miniscule. In light of what happened at Hofstra, that suits Pete Cariello just fine.

If nothing else, it put the game into perspective for me," Cariello said. "I'm dying to play, but if this happens again I could be done for good. There's no sense taking a risk like that, where all it could take is just one hit."

UMass suffers stroke in Garber marathon

By Jesse Greenspan

You would think that avoiding sudden death is a good thing.

However, if you survive 30 minutes of do-or-die overtime only to give a game away in penalty strokes, it can really spell doom for your spirits.

Such was the case yesterday for the Massachusetts field hockey team, which fell to the Providence Friars 1-0 (4-2 in strokes) at home on Richard F. Garber Field.

The loss dropped the Maroon and White to 3-7 (0-0 Atlantic 10) and sucked any momentum out of a team that will begin conference play this upcoming weekend. In contrast, the Friars improved to 8-4 (1-3 Big East) and regained their winning form after a brief two-game losing streak.

"We didn't play well until the OT, and you can't wait that long," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "You can't live on a wing and a prayer. They took it to us in the second half...even though we had opportunities, we just didn't take advantage of them."

In the first half, neither squad could solve the other's defense, and not many scoring chances were generated on either end. Even when a rare opportunity presented itself to put the ball in the net, goalies Ashley Egland (UMass) and Meaghan Moran (Providence) were there to snuff the opposing team.

On the day, Moran blocked a total of 11 shots and Egland stopped six, all while not allowing a single ball to pierce the back of the cage until the strokes period, 100 minutes after the start of the game.

After struggling in the beginning of the year, this was especially rewarding for Egland, who has put together a few solid games in a row.

"I finally have my confidence back," the sophomore netkeeper said. "Which is something I didn't really have from the end of high school until the BU game [a 2-1 Massachusetts win a week ago]. I felt my team trusted me out there although it's tough to work so hard and lose."

In the second frame, the Friars put the pressure on the Minutewomen defense early, constantly advancing the ball into the Maroon and White's circle. Providence even drew five penalty corners, although it didn't convert on any of them, after failing to garner a single penalty corner in the first half.

UMass also had its chances, however, the most prominent of which came with just over seven minuets left when Stacey Blue one-timed a nice centering pass from Lindsay Abbott toward the net, only to see it knocked away at the last second by a sprawled-out Moran.

"We weren't strong in the circle physically, and we didn't make good decisions in the goal area," Shea said.

Throughout both overtimes, the two teams once again had their chances, although neither squad was able to capitalize. This led to a strokes period in which the Friars were able to outgun the Minutewomen 4-2.

For Providence, Jennifer Chin, Courtney Dow, Stefanie Suehnholz and Katie Willett (who scored the game-winner) all were able to get the ball by Egland, while Anke Bruemmer and Ashley Gilbert notched the goals for UMass.

The fact that NCAA rules call for a third overtime of strokes, and not of regular play, was unsettling to many of the Maroon and White players, who competed hard for 100 minutes only to watch from the sidelines as the game slipped away.

"I'm not a big fan of strokes," UMass forward Stacey Blue said. "I would rather just keep on playing."

For the Friars, though, it was a nice, if somewhat hacky, victory.

"We were very, very fortunate to get the win," Providence coach Bill Davidson said. "We don't sustain pressure like them, so we have to pick away. It is a different style of play."

Freshman Adrianne Monaco has seen a wealth of playing time already as the Minutewomen head into conference play.

PC's Davidson comes home

It is not at all uncommon for Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea to look down the sideline during a game and see one of her sisters in front of the opposing bench.

It's not that Shea's actual siblings are involved in coaching; it's that UMass graduates lead four of the 12 teams on the Minutewomen's non-conference schedule. Harvard's Sue Caples, Louisville's Pam Buslin and Indiana's Sue Robertson are all sisters from within the family of tradition known as Maroon and White field hockey.

Yesterday, their lone brother showed up.

Providence head coach Bill Davidson was indeed a field hockey star during his college career at UMass, just on a slightly different stage than the University team. A midfield forward on the U.S. National Team, Davidson sacrificed countless weekends and even a whole semester representing the country in a sport considered by most Americans to be for females only.

ADAM WHITE

"When I look at this sport, I don't see it as men and women - I see it as field hockey," said the fourth-year coach following the Friars' 1-0 triple-overtime win over his alma mater.

The fact that Davidson even had the chance to ascend to the helm of a Div. 1 field hockey program speaks volumes about his devotion to the

SKATES

An hour after practice had ended, the future of UMass hockey remained on the ice, playing high school games, making footprints in the sand.

It is a rarity in the scrap pond hockey games of Eastern Massachusetts, to find that group of youth league studs that dream of a career in Amherst. Instead visitors of Conte Forum and Walter Brown Arena fill the fantasies of those aspiring superstars. What the Terriers and Eagles have is a legacy. That legacy is what UMass aspires to.

Tim Vitek and Greg Mauldin know all about creating a legacy. They're quite keen on being the first ones on the ice and the last ones off. In fact, that was the reason local figure skaters were chomping at the bit to get on the Mullins Center practice rink. There was a pair of rooks who weren't quite done with their puck-juggling exhibition - an hour after practice.

But young studs like Vitek and Mauldin, character guys, don't just show up on campus. They had to be tempted.

"Recruiting is an interesting proposition," Coach Don Cahoon said. "It is an ongoing battle for any college coach in any college sport, it's the lifeline of the program."

Luring high-end players to a college hockey program is hard enough as it is. But the fact that seven Division I programs lie within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts? The melee for quality Bay State players is furious.

So to compete with the traditions of a Boston College or a Boston University, Cahoon needs a selling point, maybe numerous selling points. Enter: the flagship campus of the Massachusetts state university system.

"We thought one of the reasons the job was attractive was because we are the flagship program of Massachusetts," Cahoon said. "We knew we could get a base of talent from the state and that we wanted to represent the state."

Cahoon's creed to recruit in-state and compete with the big time Boston schools has paid immediate dividends in the 2001 freshman class.

"When you put on a Massachusetts jersey, you have a lot of pride," freshman Matt Walsh said. "So you get a lot of Massachusetts kids, a lot of pride, a lot of hard nosed kids buying into that."

Walsh and Mauldin are just a pair of Bay State natives buying into the vision of UMass as a college hockey force. In what has to be considered a state coup, Cahoon gathered nine Massachusetts natives in his recruiting class of 11. Never in the history of UMass hockey has such a large and talented group of Bay Staters donned the Maroon and White in one recruiting year.

But then again, that was the goal all along.

Cahoon hit a soft spot buried deep in the consciousness of the state. Through sheer will and charisma, he brought out the pride in the citizens who conveniently forgot about their state university in the west – just ask Mauldin.

"People are going to start coming to UMass instead of just BU and BC all the time," Mauldin said. "You've got to have some state pride, you know."

To think that this year's recruiting triumph is a singular accomplishment would be wrong. If anything, Bay Staters received an all-expenses-paid eye opening to the wonder of UMass hockey.

"A lot of Massachusetts kids were just waiting for someone to pick this program up and take off with it," Walsh said. "I have already talked to a lot of them that want to take a look up here, that weren't even thinking about it a year ago."

Walsh and his fellow Bay State comrades simply planted a seed that has surfaced in the hockey hotbed of Eastern Massachusetts. The top players in the state have collectively shed their glassy-eyed visions of Terriers and Eagles. Minutemen are now the order of the day.

"I've known some of these [Massachusetts] kids since I was about ten years old and a lot of us played on the same team at Hockey Night in Boston," Mauldin said. "A couple of those kids, who are going to be seniors in high school this year, are coming here next year."

With the hiring of Cahoon in the summer of 2000, UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum awoke a sleeping giant with some big time recruiting muscles. He put that giant in a palace: the Mullins Center. It is now the beating heart of UMass hockey.

"You won't find any better facility in the country," Vitek said.

"The Mullins Center is awesome," Walsh said.

"The facilities were a big draw," Mauldin said.

With an arena that effortlessly remains in the top five around the country and a nationally recognized bench leader, UMass is starting to outsell Hockey East competitors and beyond.

Besides his respectful discharging of BC and BU, Mauldin also snubbed national power Colorado College for a chance to fly with the Mass Attack.

Walsh, on the other hand, couldn't wait to close the door on New Hampshire and Northeastern and sign with Cahoon's Minutemen.

"I committed on the first day of signings," Walsh said. "When I came here for my visit I just fell in love with the place right away, it didn't take much to sell it to me.

Numerous top-notch programs including Michigan recruited Vitek, a Canadian who was drafted by the Ontario Hockey League before he could legally vote. But because of the quality of the facilities in Amherst and the direction of the program, he decided maroon and white would suit him better than maize and blue.

"When I visited [Michigan and] those other Central Collegiate Hockey Association schools nothing compared to [the Mullins Center]," Vitek said. "[Coach Cahoon was] so organized in what he wanted to do and what he wanted to accomplish. That's what I wanted. I wanted a plan for the next four years and he showed that to me."

Cahoon's four-year plan is the spawn of a hockey culture in Amherst. Tradition and a legacy of success are all well and nice for those schools that are fortunate enough to have them. But there is something to be said for creating your own legacy, a fact that is firmly within the grasp of this year's freshman class.

"We are going to put our feet in the sand first," Vitek said. "But this is going to be a good core class to start off. When we are juniors and seniors we're going to have a great class to run with."

The beauty of the Mullins Center and the untapped pride of the community are both tools of the trade for Cahoon's recruiting revolution. But his most useful devices are likely his instincts and aggression.

"From the day we got here we made a laundry list of kids we wanted. We tried to strike real early while other programs were waiting around," Cahoon said. "We were making offers and getting them out here for visits and selling them on the whole concept of turning this program in the right direction. We took a very aggressive stance."

Stealing blue chip recruits from under the nasal passages of the top end Boston schools is all well and good. But what it comes down to is building a foundation of quality individuals, not just talented players.

"The character aspect is huge when recruiting guys," Cahoon said. "Our locker room is full of role models. Kids you would be happy to have in your home or representing your University and your hockey program."

For the first time in the history of the program, the powerhouse Boston schools have a major league threat on their flank. That threat is a budding UMass hockey tradition.

"We call it footprints in the sand," Cahoon said. "Kids can come here and put their footprint in the sand."

Footprints in the sand. One day soon some pee-wee superstar will follow those footprints to that picturesque scene of pickup pond hockey and he'll shout, "I wanna be UMass."

Celebrate good times - come on!

By Matthew F. Sacco and Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Plain and simple, last year was a disappointment. Don Cahoon was praised as the savior of the Massachusetts hockey program – a promise he could not have fulfilled in just one season. The team finished ninth in Hockey East, one point shy of making the postseason.

This year's team has a wealth of youthful talent, including 11 incoming freshmen and five sophomores.

Once again, Massachusetts fans will be demanding the most out of Cahoon's squad, and this team has a boatload of talent, but not a lot of experience.

Forwards

The loss of senior captain Jeff Turner will be felt by the Minutemen, as he was the top line center last year. However, his brother Tim has already proven himself as a scoring force in Hockey East, as he has notched 52 points in his two years at UMass.

Along with Turner up front will likely be senior Martin Miljko, who last year made his full comeback from surgeries on both knees. Miljko is the team's top sniper, his 12 goals last season put him behind only Turner on the team. He was UMass's best shot from the slot on the power play, and his six extra-man goals were best on the team.

Thomas Pock was impressive in his freshman campaign, putting up 12 points for the season. His play at Wisconsin earned him Hockey East Rookie of the Week honors, as he notched his first career goal in the two game set. Pock will be looked at as someone who is needed to step up his play, as he will likely be penciled in as first line center.

Junior Jimmy Callahan was impressive in his first season with the Maroon and White, as he played with the Turner brothers for the majority of the season. His 15 assists are tops of any returning player, so his offensive play will be essential for the team to climb its way out of the Hockey East cellar.

Brad Nizwantowski had a strong season for the Minutemen, especially in conference games, where his 15 points were one behind the Turners'. His plus-five rating in conference matches was duly impressive. His leadership skills are necessary for the team, which is very inexperienced up front.

Dany King is the only other senior among the forwards, and his skill as a two-way player will bring a crucial element to the talent up front. His plus-five rating overall was by far the best on the team and his passing skills should mean good scoring numbers for the young guns.

Scott Horvath had the thrill this summer of being taken in the NHL draft in the sixth round by the Colorado Avalanche. His six-foot-three 228-pound frame will provide the Maroon and White with a prime-time power forward, which should lead to an improvement on the power play.

"Pock, Callahan and Horvath have all shown some ability around the net," said UMass head coach Don Cahoon.

Tim Turner

Mike Johnson

Scott Horvath

Speed and agility will come in the form of Mike Warner, who put home four goals in limited action last year. He should make an impact this season, as he is one of only eight returning forwards for the Minutemen.

As for the freshmen, there are plenty of them. Timothy Vitek, Greg Mauldin, Matt Walsh, Justin Rafferty, Peter Trovato, Craig MacDonald and Matt Edlin will probably all see playing time this year. Vitek is a speedster from Ontario who will add speed to a shooting lineup. Mauldin played last year for the Boston Junior Bruins, where he put up 106 points in 53 games using his tremendous slapshot.

"I think you are going to see us get around the rink better," Cahoon said. "We've got some kids who can scoot a little bit."

As for Walsh, he played three years at Arlington High before moving on to Northfield Mount Hermon, where he was a force. Rafferty's agility and passing skills could land him a spot on one of the team's top lines, as he put up 95 points last year.

Trovato and MacDonald each played three seasons at the famed Catholic Memorial before moving on to Deerfield Academy and Noble & Greenough, respectively. Both will likely see a decent amount of playing time. Edlin played four years at Eastern Mass. powerhouse Needham High before moving on to the Kent School, where he honed his talents and could log some minutes this year.

Defense

The UMass defense is a generous mix of bone crunching hits, offensive talent and true grit.

"You are definitely going to see a real nice mix [of players]," Toni Soderholm said.

Anchoring the unit will be two defensive stalwarts from the East who are similar only in their work ethic.

"I think [defense] is our strength," Cahoon said. "Jalkanen and Soderholm are really the creme of that group."

Samuli Jalkanen exploded into his sophomore year with a defense-leading 14 points out of the back. Although the diminutive Fin scored only one goal in 2000-01, he more than made amends with his 13 assists.

He isn't the biggest D-man in the league at 5-foot-10, but pound-for-pound he is one of the hardest hitters in the conference.

Soderholm is an absolute rock on the blueline. He has the hockey I.Q. to overcome a slow first step and he has the anticipation to make the pinpoint outlet pass. Shoot, pass or body check, there is nothing the menacing Soderholm can't do. A little tweaking of his scoring touch could be the hinge on the door to an All-Hockey East selection.

Also returning from last year's unit are Randy Drohan and Nick Kuiper. Drohan has looked much quicker and much stronger in camp this year, as he looks to graduate on a positive note. Kuiper, on the other hand, has the ability to be a franchise defenseman in his remaining three years of eligibility.

"Kuiper played enough last year to give him a taste of it," Cahoon said. "He has come back and he is in great shape."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

The Minutemen will hope to do a lot more celebrating (pictured above) in the upcoming season.

Overall, Cahoon brought in three freshmen that will all see action this year.

"We think all three freshman will help us," Cahoon said. "Hopefully over the course of the year they will be nice contributors."

Jeff Lang's style is suitable for the collegiate game, as he doesn't shy away from body contact. Massachusetts natives Dusty Demianiuk and Sean Regan are also expected to break into the lineup as the season progresses.

Goalies

Replacing Markus Helanen will certainly not be easy for the Minutemen, but if anybody is ready to step into the starter's shoes, it is last year's backup, Mike Johnson. Johnson struggled early in the year, but as the conference slate wore on, Johnson got better and better. He played one of the finest games in the school's Division I history, posting 60 saves in a 3-3 tie against BC on Feb. 23, a performance that netted him Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week honors.

For the year, he put together a .891 save percentage, but his .902 performance in conference games was quite impressive. He is welcoming the challenge of stepping up to the task.

"[Johnson] knows he can play at this level," Cahoon said. "He just needs to bear down and be consistent and be a battler."

Backing him up will be freshman Tim Warner, who was impressive last year at vaunted Avon Old Farms. His .931 save percentage and 2.10 goals against average turned more than a couple heads and he should log some minutes in relief of Johnson.

MHC lecture traces literary circle history

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Elizabeth McHenry, professor of African-American studies at New York University delivered the Mount Holyoke College Elizabeth T. Kennan Lecture yesterday in Mary Woolley Hall.

The lecture was given in honor of Mary McHenry, a Mount Holyoke Emeritus Professor of English and the speaker's mother. McHenry was a Mount Holyoke alumnus who returned to the College in the 1970s to pioneer its African-American Studies Department.

The lecture was named in honor of former MHC President Kennan. McHenry's lecture, "The Lost History of African-American Literary," dealt with the formation of black literary societies in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

McHenry began the lecture by explaining that her interest in these societies began when she came across a reference to a "black women's reading club" in Charlottesville, Va., in the early 1900s.

"Nothing in my training explained to me how black women at the turn of the century would have had time to sit around reading," she said. "I tried to figure out what these women were doing."

McHenry began researching the issue, and found an article in a 1925 edition of Publisher's Weekly, which described an itinerant black bookseller by the name of Katherine Johnson. Johnson was unique to booksellers of the era because she sold exclusively to African-Americans.

"She wanted to sell books to people who would be inspired by them," said McHenry. "She chose books that she said would 'help the Negro to understand his place in America'." McHenry explained that Johnson often sold enormous quantities of her books to enthusiastic black audiences, a fact which perplexed the article's author.

"Why," McHenry wondered, "was it so amazing to [the author of this piece] that blacks read?"

The answer, she said, is that the black literary tradition was, and still is often is, ignored.

"Historically, much has been recognized about black oral tradition," she said, "but that has undermined the long history of African-American's literary interaction."

Much of the lecture was dedicated to describing the beginnings of black literary circles among free blacks in northern cities like Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and the intentions of the societies' creators.

McHenry explained that the societies were often segregated by gender. Men's societies were held formally, in public locations, with elaborate rules of order and constitutions. Women's societies, on the other hand, were much more casual, and often researchers' only clues that they existed are announcements for their meetings found in newspapers and magazines.

The societies, both male and female, were formed mostly for the reading of black-authored literature. The study of these works often had a profound effect on the participants.

McHenry quoted one woman, a frequent society attendee, who wrote about how her readings affected her views on civil rights.

"One short year ago, how different were my feelings on slavery!" she said. "I had formed a little world of my own, but how the scene changed when I saw the oppressor lurking at the door of my peaceful home! I saw an iron hand stretch forth to see me as his prey! The cause of slavery became my own. I will elevate the character of my wronged and neglected race."

A male participant wrote that, after reading the works of black authors like Frederick Douglass, he realized that these limbs were never meant to be chained in servitude."

Members of literary societies often became leaders in the abolitionist cause. McHenry feels that, had the societies been better publicized, public opinion may have been swayed in favor of black rights. She pointed out that one of the leading arguments of those who saw blacks as inferior was that African-Americans were often illiterate.

One writer in a Philadelphia abolitionist newspaper attended a black literary society, and was quoted as saying, "Their discussions expressed an elevation and elegance of language for which I was little prepared."

One of the great ironies of these literary circles, though, was that they often inadvertently reiterated the rhetoric of slave-owners. The Pheonix, one of the most important black literary societies, stated in its constitution that the "role of well-read scholars" is more important

SGA sponsors free concert

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's Programming Board will be presenting folk-rock singer Gregory Douglass in a free concert tomorrow evening.

Douglass, a veteran performer at the University of Massachusetts, will be playing on the 11th floor of the Campus Center at 8 p.m.

The concert is the Programming Board's first effort to get more events out to students.

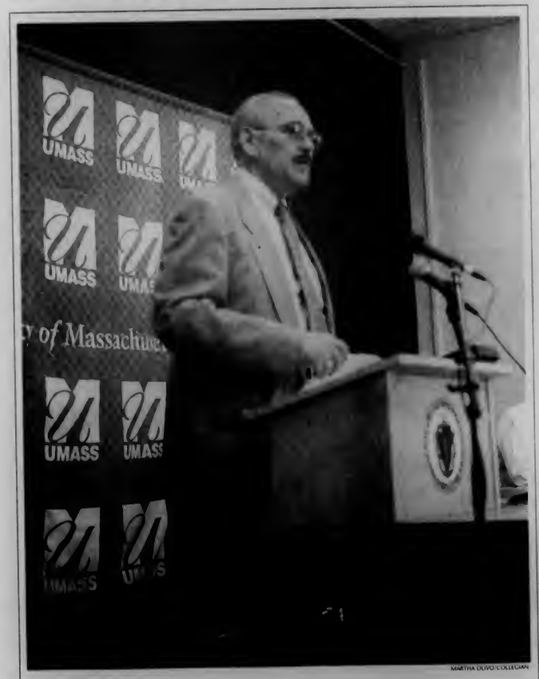
"There used to be a homecoming concert every year, but now much of the attention is just focused on returning UMass alumni," Chair of the Programming Board Ed Kammerer said. "We're hoping that this will be able to tie into future homecoming events."

The Programming Board lies directly under the Secretary of Registrar position occupied by Kammerer, and has previously been noted for allocating funding to Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) for their own events. However, this year the SGA has changed the Programming Board's position by moving their function of allocating money to the SGA Senate's Finance Committee. This frees the Programming Board to put on events of their own with a separate budget rather than funding other organizations for their events.

"This campus is so huge and there aren't enough events that appeal to everyone on this campus," Kammerer said. "Everyone has their own individual groups of events, but there is not an event that brings the six areas [the five residential areas, and commuter students] together, and we want to change that."

Kammerer explained the Programming Board's position as a group independent from the SGA, except that the organization gets its funds from student government.

The Board hopes to present not only tomorrow night's concert but a series of events for students throughout the year. One idea expressed by Kammerer was a Winter Carnival, something not new to the University.



"I've been looking in old yearbooks, and just like Spring Concert used to be held out by the Campus Pond, so did a Winter Carnival," Kammerer said.

The Winter Carnival would allow other organizations the chance to have a role in the festivities. Kammerer expressed the Programming Board's idea to have booths available for RSOs, food venders from the community and music, as well as other live performances.

Other ideas were the possibility of a week of UMass Olympics between the residential areas.

"Our main goal is to bring back the spirit of this University," Kammerer said. "Communication between groups on campus has been lacking. By putting 26 individuals from all areas of campus in a room working and communicating together we will be able to have better communication and events in the future."

Right now, the Board is made up of acting members SGA President John Sheehan, Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Tom Heenor and Kammerer. A revised Constitution of the Programming Board will state that the membership be made up of 26 students from university RSOs, Area Governments, SGA members as well as students. The issue is set for discussion at the Wednesday, Oct. 17 SGA Senate meeting.

Search committee listens

By Elizabeth Pariseau
Collegian Staff

Four members of the University of Massachusetts Chancellor Search Committee made themselves available to students on Wednesday, Oct. 10.

Though 162 chairs had been set up in the Campus Center Auditorium, only a few students were in attendance, among them Student Government Association Secretary of University Policy Jen Casavant. SGA Senate Associate Speaker Bill Powers, SGA Senators Dan Saunders and Blake Keppe, Orchard Hill Area Governor David Carr and Jason Allister, a sixth year Communications major and an advisor to the SGA.

Members of the Search Committee that were present were Grace Fay, the Chair of the Board of Trustees, John Isaacson, an executive recruiter with Isaacson-Miller, alumnus Daniel Riviera ('96), Stephen Tocco, a parent of a UMass student and Secretary of the Faculty Senate Ernest May.

During the discussion, before addressing the future, many students revisited the past.

Former Chancellor David K. Scott was often invoked as an example of what not to do to fulfill the expectations for a new chancellor. Many said they felt that he had not been as present on campus as he should have been.

"I talked to people who were seniors, who still had no idea what he looked like," Casavant said.

Students said that they felt that there was a lack of pride on campus. It was noted that this lack of morale has far-reaching consequences, especially in the area of alumni relations.

"Many students have a disdain for the university by the time they graduate," Casavant said.

Students informed the committee members that often, seniors are forced to take an extra semester because required classes are unavailable.

"It's no wonder alumni contributions have been down," Tocco said. "Students must feel that they've already spent their money on those extra semesters.

"Raising money from parents would be easier if their kids came here and had a good time."

Allister added that students' disdain may continue after they leave. He noted that the campus center eateries are not open on weekend when alumni might visit, and that events on weekends are scarce.

"The campus is empty and in disrepair," Allister said. "Who would want to come back to that?"

Students also debated what they saw as flaws in the academic system. They appeared unanimous in their criticism of phone registration, but were

It has been a week since the 23 brothers living at Delta Upsilon fraternity house lost all of their possessions.

The brothers that resided at 778 North Pleasant St. were allowed to stay at the Campus Center Hotel until last Tuesday morning while a more permanent situation was being worked out with the University.

A more permanent solution has been worked out. The brothers are going to be allowed to live at the University Lodge for the remainder of the semester, reported Michael Wiseman, Director of Greek Affairs.

Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin said, "We're looking at each case separately." DU brothers were given vouchers from the Red Cross for clothing and food as well as the opportunity of an emergency loan by the Dean of Students office if they feel they need the extra assistance, said Vanin. Artist uses hair to express in Amherst College exhibit

By Esther Suh
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst College alumna and artist Sonya Clark spoke Friday at the Stirn Auditorium.

Her lecture titled "From Hair to There: Cultural Roots as Artistic Inspiration."

Clark, 1981 was the youngest of 18 artists that were asked to exhibit their work at the Mead Art Museum on the campus. The display celebrates the 30 years of visual arts shared among the alumni ranging from 1935-1989. Clark is currently an assistant professor in the Department of Environment, Textiles and Design at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

"There is a wide range of mediums styles, and subjects displayed in the exhibit," said Jill Meredith, who is the director of Mead Museum.

Clark's artistic inspirations come from her heritage and background in psychology, which she studied as an undergraduate at Amherst. She later went on to the School of the Art Institute of Chicago and received her Masters degree in fine arts from the Cranbrook Academy of Art in Bloomfield Hills, Mich.

The 60 slides she shared with the audience were striking creations that were made from beads, textiles, and fiber to emulate African hairstyles. The headdresses are symbols of the power of her African heritage.

Clark said she had cut her hair in 1987 and since she grew up always braiding hair she went on to art as an extension of the habit. She also believes cloth is an important apparatus for her artwork.

"Hair is the primordial fiber art," said Clark. "Textiles have power to hold memories and it has power to know you."

Coming from a diverse background, which includes links from Jamaica, Trinidad, Scotland as well as Africa, Clark emphasized her shared heritage and culture as an inspiration to her artwork. The history of her ancestry such as slavery contributed many ideas to her works.

"I was consciously aware that slaves were able to use their hands and make things that were useful," said Clark. "My grandfather made fine furniture."

Clark jokingly said that her job making headdresses was imminent since her father was a psychologist and her grandmother a tailor.

The influences of her degree in psychology were apparent through her displays of dendrites and nerves that were included in some of her pieces.

She stressed her thoughts about the body being a vessel and wanting to make "the soul surface out of the head."

"The head is a generating seed," said Clark. "It has potential for what soul can be and it protects the tenderness of the soul."

She shared a saying from Africa that said, "a river that forgets its source dries up."

Clark believes in a constant running river where thoughts and ideas of different generations were passed down. She said that in order to pass on traditions, diversity has to be tolerated.

"If you hold onto traditions too much, it'll break," said Clark. "If it's a reed that bends, then you can save it."

In a released statement from Amherst College, Clark said she uses her work to strengthen her place in the future and not focus on the past.

"As a medium, fiber permits me to claim my place in the African textile continuum," Clark said. "[It] was brought to the Western Hemisphere during trans-Atlantic slavery and continually re-embodies itself today in the African American quilt-making tradition, African Caribbean carnivals and the work of many contemporary artists."

The exhibition was co-sponsored by the Department of Black Studies and the Department of Fine Arts at Amherst College and made possible by the Associates of Fine Arts also supported it.

The Mead is open Tuesday through Sunday, 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., Thursday evenings until 9 p.m., and is closed Mondays and holidays.

Clark also shared about her project called "Beaded Prayers" which she started in 1999 and she built it to bring people together. She called it art in action. It is made up of different artworks made of an array of beads.

"The etymology of the word bead means to ask or pray," said Clark.

Since the tragedy that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001, she has gotten even greater participation.

"This project," she said, "owns me."

that any other in the history of man. McHenry pointed out that supporters of slavery often made identical comments, and maintained that this was a reason that "illiterate" blacks could not be expected to participate meaningfully in society.

At the conclusion of her lecture, McHenry took questions from the assembled audience. The first question dealt with the impact of modern book clubs, such as Oprah Winfrey's.

"Everyone asks me that question!" McHenry said. "But it's a good question, and an important one."

She explained that she devoted the end of her book on the topic of black reading circles by addressing Oprah's Book Club.

"Oprah's most successful venture as a talk show host is the creation of her book club," McHenry said. "She's reintroduced reading as a popular form of entertainment."

She called it the most successful book club in America's history, and noted the importance of the prevalence of books by black authors among Oprah's selections.

In the question-and-answer period, McHenry also addressed the issue of religion in the societies, and in black literature.

"When I started the study," she said, "my understanding of black readers in those days was that they didn't read – but if they did, they read the Bible."

McHenry stressed that, while much of the commonly read material in literary societies was religious, the societies themselves, and their missions, were mostly secular.

"Most of the groups I've written about weren't connected to a church," she said.

Lynda Morgan, a Mount Holyoke Professor of History, was in attendance at the lecture. Morgan praised McHenry's speech, and stressed the importance of understanding black literary circles and the role that they played in society.

"When I teach the history of slavery," Morgan said, "I always stress the desire to acquire literacy as a sort of grassroots civil rights movement. I think these literary societies demonstrate that."

Students office is writing letters to the professors of students affected since they lost textbooks as well as class notes, according to Wiseman.

"We lost everything. Not even a wallet or keys," said Senior Economics major and DU brother Jason Batista. "All I had was a pair of sneakers, pajamas and a t-shirt." Batista, luckily, is covered under his parents' home owners' insurance.

The brothers have a chance of receiving some type of reimbursement from the fraternity, said Wiseman.

Ruby Meng, General Manager of Howard Johnson (managers of the University Lodge), reported that quite a few brothers checked in this week. Even though the brothers are responsible for the cost of housing at the Lodge, Meng claims "we're losing money. It is lower than our rates. We'd like to help the fraternity."

Wiseman, on the other hand, said it is "comparable to what they [would] pay in the dorms."

"Reservations are being booted for these guys," said Wiseman. Despite attempts to confirm that reservations were in fact being cancelled, a front desk manager referred comment to Meng, who was unavailable.

"[The] Lodge is trying to help people in need, but they can only do it for so long," said Wiseman. "I think they are doing a good thing."

However, he is optimistic that there will be more spaces available for brothers next semester.

Marketing careers await many SOM grads; alumni help out

By Bill Larkin
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts alumna Katherine Labonte '1941 studies Finance in an MBA program at Western New England College.

Labonte, who hopes to find a job at a large mutual fund company someday, will start balancing her studies with work in December when she begins training tellers and advertising saving accounts as the manager at the new South Hadley branch of the Easthampton Savings Bank.

William S. Hogan Jr., president of Easthampton Savings Bank, hired Labonte, who has worked for John Hancock Financial Services and FirstMass, because she "possessed the best skills and managing background."

Labonte, who majored in Marketing, and Apparel Marketing, represents only one of the many School of Management (SOM) majors who have graduated from the university to go on to the business world.

Ann Fein, the Director of Placement for SOM, said that 70 percent of SOM seniors find work before graduation. According to Fein, graduating seniors earn "from $20,000 to $50,000 a year" in these jobs.

"The Career Placement Office encourages students to start looking for career placement as soon as possible," Fein said.

At the start of every year, Fein sends a letter to the parents of SOM seniors, asking them to urge their children to start searching for jobs in September. In October, the university hosts an annual career fair, where recruiters accept resumes and establish contacts with SOM students.

The Career Placement Office offers SOM majors a co-op program that provides students with three, six, and nine month credited internships, connecting students to the business world before they graduate. SOM students learn how to draft resumes in junior year writing classes, because "especially in management-related jobs, careers begin early, even before students receive their diplomas," Fein said.

To offer students "a sense of the possibilities" inherent in the business world, members of the Alumni Mentor Program talk to students in several classes every year about the demands and responsibilities of their jobs.

Michelle Toth ('90), found her first job at A.T. Kearney, a consulting firm in Manhattan through help from Lee Forst ('70), an alumni mentor.

"Lee gave me many insights into the consulting profession, and eventually helped me get a job with his firm," Toth said.

Since he graduated from the university in 1978, Mark Hanny has created IBM's Business Partner Program and led IBM's $762 million acquisition of Tivoli Business Solutions. Hanny now works as the marketing channel manager of IBM's Internet Division.

"My career has always involved technology and marketing," Hanny said. "UMass and the Isenberg School gave me an excellent foundation in both of those areas."

William Diamond, head of the Marketing Department, said 110 to 120 students graduate each year, finding jobs in small businesses and national companies such as Fidelity, American Express, and Pepsi.

Although the department has always satisfied employer expectations by teaching traditional market topics such as market research, consumer behavior, and product positioning, its "curriculum and extra-curriculum offerings have changed dramatically in recent years," Diamond said.

Marketing majors who complete a series of information technology courses focusing on databases and the World Wide Web can now receive an Information Technology Letter of Specialization.

"We are developing a department of Marketing internships," Diamond said.

Next spring, the SOM plans to offer a Nonprofit and Social Marketing course where students can "apply marketing skills such as database use and the marketing audit to solve the problems of nonprofit organizations."

divided on the issue of honors colloquiums as a means of enriching programs for students.

"They make the college a lot smaller," Keppe said. "Professors are there to offer help if you ask for it, but you have to want to go above and beyond."

Allister countered that the colloquiums were not available to many non-honors students.

"We used to have a thing called a discussion session," Allister said. "It was available to everybody. It's supposed to be part of the course. I can't justify putting in that much more work just to get a discussion session."

Casavant said that she had seen a disturbing psychological trend in how students perform at the university.

"More confident students will have a good experience," Casavant said. "But if you're not as forward or outgoing, no one is there to help you."

Casavant connected the academic issues to those of pride and morale, saying,

"At the New Students Program, we told incoming students that they had put the UMass logo on something the size of a cell in the polymer research department," said Casavant, who participated in the New Students Program last summer. "But people at NSP said, people can't get into classes. What did they do that for?"

Saunders and Allister said that students aren't given power over their own activities. Since UMass united all Registered Student Organizations under the Campus Activities Office, events have been harder to plan, Allister said.

Saunders and Powers said that they felt that the power of the SGA had been stripped away in recent years.

Casavant pointed out a vicious circle that tends to develop where "students feel ignored, and then they start to ignore the administration."

"It sounds like communication is not happening on this campus," Fay said.

In tackling the future, among the more thoroughly covered discussion topics was the idea of what students referred to as a "culture of apathy" among undergraduate students in recent years.

"What type of chancellor would turn that around?" Tocco asked.

Saunders replied, "a leader. Someone who could work with everyone." He said he felt that once enthusiasm is felt in the administration, it will then "trickle down" to the faculty, and, in turn, to the students.

Allister said that he wanted to see a chancellor who would be interested in a partnership with faculty and students.

Other suggestions were that a chancellor who was "visible," and "real," and who "looked like a real person, not someone off in the distance controlling things," would heighten school pride among students. Attendance at school events and sports contests was suggested as a way for a chancellor to remain close with the campus population.

Saunders said that he felt that undergraduates do not hear enough about successful alumni. Few students are aware, he said, of famous alumni like Jack Welch, the CEO of General Electric. He said he thought that more publicity for those who had been successful with a UMass degree would help school pride.

"This [meeting is] very helpful," said Tocco. "I know that the job description I would write for the chancellor is different after this day on campus than it was yesterday."

"Hopefully," Isaacson said, "we can use this search to launch a new beginning for UMass."

The Search Committee will speak with students on campus throughout the remainder of the week and will return to campus on Oct. 24.

Hate crimes on campus
Media ignoring the issue

Much has been written about the numerous hate crimes that have befallen the Arab-American community in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. However, one aspect of anti-Arab discrimination that has been mostly ignored in the press has been its prevalence on college campuses.

In the week after the attacks, the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee reported 250 violent incidents on college campuses. Muslim students across the country have filed complaints of being spat upon, having scarves and turbans stolen or removed, and receiving violent threats.

Altaf Hussein, president of the Muslim Students Association of the U. S. and Canada, reports that people have yelled, "you people are going to die", "the holy war has begun", and "go home" at him and other Islamic students.

Other minorities, including blacks, and Hispanics, have been subjected to abuse. At the recent University of Massachusetts Native American Pow Wow, Joyce Vincent, director of the Dr. Josephine White Eagle Native American Center, stated that many Native Americans have been told to "go back to their own countries."

It is only natural that, in light of a tragedy as severe as the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, the public will become hungry for someone to blame. However, it is clear that in this case, that "someone" should be Osama bin Laden, and those that helped him carry out the attacks – not the Arab people as a whole.

President Bush, along with countless others, has denounced discriminations against Arabs and Muslims, maintaining that "America's war" is against terrorists, and not the Islamic religion. "Our nation must be mindful that there are thousands of Arab-Americans who live in New York City," he said, "who love their flag just as much as the three of us do."

However, that point seems to have been lost on many American college students. At the University of Colorado – Boulder, statements like "Nuke Sand Niggers" and "Arabs Go Home" were written on the columns of the library. A Muslim student reported being harassed by men dressed in black, who used racial epithets.

These incidents occurred after the University administration sent an e-mail to all members of the campus community urging them to "not take their anger out on minorities," and the SGA passed a resolution condemning "any person who retaliates against a faculty member, student, or staff." In addition, professors had spent the previous day discussing the attacks with their students, and faculty members had met with Muslims to discuss safety issues.

Racial and religious discrimination is always abhorrent, but it is even more unacceptable when it takes place at institutions of higher learning. College campuses are noted for being liberal, especially on issues of diversity and racial awareness. Much has been made of "political correctness" in American universities, but these incidents have barely been mentioned. For the cradle of 1960s liberal activism to become a hotbed for bigotry is a horrifying turn of events, and the mainstream media should not ignore it.

Hangover Paranoia

KEN CAMPBELL

The sun is nature's way of telling creatures it is time to wake up. It is the closest star to our shins little planet, and the source of all life. It is also God's police flashlight shining in your eyes at 5 a.m., after a Saturday night/Sunday morning flip cup tournament involving you and ninety of your closest friends.

It's always a bad sign when you leave wherever you woke up (which is invariably several hundred yards to miles away from your place of residence) and see that big glowing orb, searing its way into your brain, shoving aside the gray matter in an attempt to get to the back of your skull. In moving aside your cerebrum, it upsets things, and causes your entire head to rebel against the rest of your body. For instance, in my case, my left eyebrow tends to have a severe disagreement with the temple it is located near, and decides to convey this feeling of discontent via mental artillery, booming back and forth across my poor, poor skull.

And all the while the sun smiles balefully down, glad to see me in pain.

It smiles down as I get in a car and ride to the Holyoke Mall, where I learn that Holyoke is the birthplace of volleyball and street crime. It also seems as though everyone in that mall, from the tiniest puppy to the sweet old ladies scheming on how to beat them slots at Mohegan Sun, knows that I am completely hung over.

I am not alone.

Oh no, I know there were several others out there as well. We know. Oh, we know. We can sense it, like Radar O'Reilly with incoming choppers - we can hear your hangover beating at the air around your head like so many pissed off honeybees.

Don't expect us to sympathize. We've got our own problems over here. We're still trying to track down all our limbs after that bitchin' party. We need a steady stream of milkshake, water, Gatorade, anything non-alcoholic and fairly palatable at this point.

And patience? Screw you. If I'm hung over and you're in my way, expect to have a Collegian column-nist-shaped hole through you. Especially at the ATM machine. I need currency to fuel my recovery efforts. I can't expect the UN to be dropping care packages on my middle-class ass. Lady who can't figure out which side the stripey end goes, get out of my way. You don't deserve to get sweet, sweet fast cash. Stop rubbing the card on your leg. Your oh-so-fashionable stirrup pants don't have the magic required to increase your intelligence or your cash flow.

Ah, but with cash in hand, or rather, in pocket, I have everything I need to procure my respite from nasty Mr. Hangover. And it is Mr. Hangover. Try calling him Hangie and he'll kick your butt from here to Waldenbooks. But I'm nothing if not respectful of the power of my hangover, and I always call him 'sir.' But, after successfully negotiating the glaring monstrosity that is the ATM machine (Yes, I took my receipt, stop beeping, please, for the love of God, oh it hurts) I can now trade the little green portraitures for what I really need – food.

After a night to midmorning of professional drinking, most doctors recommend really horrible food to make you feel better. Food guaranteed to shave months off your life at the mere inhalation of its cholesterol packed, heart-clogging evil. That's right: I'm talking about Mickey D's.

"Lady who can't figure out which side the striped-end of the card goes, get out of my way. You don't deserve to get sweet, sweet fast cash. Stop rubbing the card on your leg. Your-oh-so-fashionable stirrup pants don't have the magic required to increase your intelligence or your cash flow."

Of course, when you're suffering as bad as I was, the last thing you need is non-hungover contact. Hangovers, like all other miseries, are best dealt with along with people in like situations. The best companion for a hangover would be a corpse. Lacking a cadaver, the next best thing is somebody as hung over as you.

Luckily, I had such a person with me, which made things easier. For instance, I knew I wasn't alone when I saw everyone staring at me, with looks on their faces like the ghost of Captain Morgan was arising from my back and carving mustaches on all the mannequins in Old Navy with his rummy cutlass.

And, since we had somehow forgotten how to converse in English, we could only point to what we wanted. Apparently my compatriot, lacking the hand-eye coordination that hours earlier had won her the inter-continental flip cup championship, pointed at the wrong thing, and consequently her order was messed up. Fortunately though, our milkshakes appeared in good working order and were much appreciated as we sat and wondered how wrong it would be to end the screaming children that surrounded us. Then we realized the screaming children were all in our heads, grabbing at our precious medulla oblongata with their sticky, syrupy hands and twisting, oh the twisting.

The milkshakes restored our ability to talk, and we were then able to have the most wonderful conversation, which pretty much went like this:

Me: "I hate my life."
Her: "Kill me."
Me: "Don't talk so loud."
Her: "I'm whispering; stop shouting."
Me: "I'm not shouting."
Her: "I hate my life."
Me: "Kill me."

You get the idea. This went on for hours.

But the worst thing, the absolute worse thing to encounter when hung over is someone you used to work with. They're there, and they're happy, and they know. Oh they know…

Wait, I already wrote this paragraph.

Anyway, we survived, due to massive quantities of selfpity and fluids. We were both on IV drips, just like on ER.

And as we rode home, watching the pretty trees go by our windows, singing along to the radio, we knew that we were lucky. We survived hangover paranoia, and we had learned a valuable lesson about the dangers of alcohol.

Under that brilliant blue October sky, hurtling along the yellow line of the Massachusetts back roads, we swore an oath. We pledged, under penalty of eternal damnation, that we would never, ever, drink that much again.

Well, at least not on weekdays.

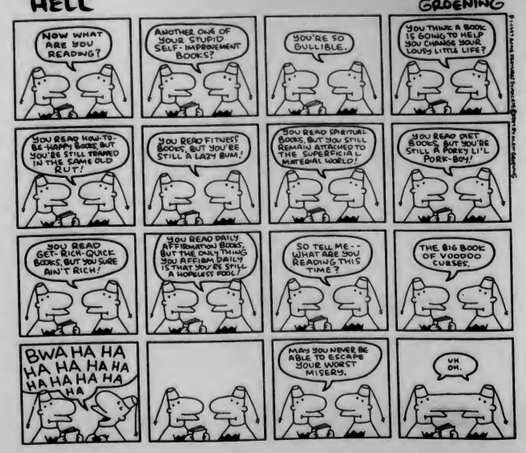
The Crimson class?
How about UMass pride?

ERIC MARTIGNETTI

So I was reading The Boston Globe this past Sunday and I stumbled upon a front-page story about Harvard. Despite its renown as one of the world's most prestigious universities, this story appeared conspicuously below the fold. How ironic, I thought. Harvard was not below the fold in anything except maybe humility. Any story about Harvard University would certainly merit presence above the fold. My interest piqued by this tiny irony, I decided to read on.

The story began talking about a Professor Mansfield who taught a course on modern political philosophy. Oh, great, I thought, just what I need, another pompous windbag telling me how worthless my state education is in comparison to the immeasurable value of the Harvard experience. As I read further, however, I was shocked to discover that this professor was criticizing Harvard. It was not just any criticism, but a most severe criticism of Harvard's grading policy (or lack thereof). Mansfield claims that he is forced to issue two grades to students – one that reflects their actual effort and one that reflects the inflated grade that the university wants professors literally to give away. Harvard graduated 91 percent of its class with honors last June. Compare that with 51 percent for Yale and 44 percent for Princeton and you get a recipe for "we-think-we're-better-than-you-but-our-grades-are-just-inflated" cockiness.



I couldn't believe what I was reading. I was stunned, angered, appalled, and jovial all at once. The "Beast from the East" was nothing more than a blow-up doll, Halloween costume, and a facade. In all fairness to Harvard (after all they have been more than fair to all their students), there exists no single scale by which to grade. Mansfield could have lowered his grades, yet he did not want to penalize his student, who must compete with others for honors spots. Again, in all fairness, I am probably less intelligent than almost everyone at Harvard and there are many people at Harvard that do actually work to get the grades they deserve.

My beef isn't with the Harvard students even if some of them are so pretentiously annoying that they make an episode of Joan Rivers' Fashion Emergencies seem pleasant. My beef is with Harvard and its administration. These people project an image of elitism; they make us "staties" feel as though we are the dregs of society. Phoniness and pretense are as much a part of their institution as Veritas is. To advertise that their university graduates the most honors students is blatant hypocrisy. They hide behind a cloak of preeminence while they fail to reveal the filthy underbelly. I think Harvard should enter a float in this year's Macy's Parade. It would read: our grades are more inflated than our heads (if you can believe that). It would be a nice, big crimson float. Crimson appropriately, is not only the school's color and nickname, but it is also the color of guilt. Harvard has been caught red-handed.

When I first applied to college two years ago, I didn't even bother sending Harvard an application. I didn't even deem myself worthy of applying; I though they were too good for me. But I was wrong. I am too good for them. So what if I go to a lowly state school. So what if I am not good enough for the Ivy League. So what if our colors are maroon and not crimson? At least I earn my grades. At least I don't feign to be among the elite intelligentsia. At least my university doesn't charge me $30,000 a year for fake grades. I may be on a penny-per-pound scholarship, I may not be Harvard material, but you know what, I keep it real. What you see is what you get: an reasonably intelligent UMass sophomore who earns his keep. I am not the Crimson, I am a Minuteman… and damn proud of it.

Oliver Button is a STAR

Play teaches acceptance

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

In the years following the shootings at Columbine High School, school boards and legislatures across the country have scrambled to address the issue of bullying. Many analysts have suggested that Dylan Klebold and Eric Harris, the Columbine shooters, were driven to violence by years of torment at the hands of their peers, and have recommended that steps be taken to curb aggressive behavior by school-children. A recent study by the National Institutes for Health found that a quarter of middle-school-aged children were either bullies or their victims, or both.

The creators of the play "Oliver Button is a STAR!", which will be performed at 7:00 p.m. tonight in Mahar Auditorium, decided to address the issue of bullying by producing a play about how children deal with peer pressure and gender stereotypes. "Oliver Button is a STAR!" is based on Tomie dePaola's children's book Oliver Button is a Sissy, which chronicles the plight of a young boy who shuns traditional sports for dancing – which draws the ire of his father and his classmates.

"Oliver Button is a Sissy" was recently adapted as a musical by the Twin Cities Gay Men's Chorus, who will appear in tonight's show. Joining the chorus on stage will be author dePaola, Northampton schoolteacher Mary Cowhey and her first grade class.

"We've documented the performance [by the Gay Men's Chorus], and used it as a narrative structure," says Dan Hunt, the show's producer. "We've also intercut it with narratives from dePaola, and interviews from four adults about their childhood."

These adults include a makeup artist and an Arctic explorer. In addition to the chorus and speakers, "Oliver Button is a STAR!" utilizes video footage of old commercials and news programs, as well as animation.

"Our idea is to show it to educators, whether current teachers, folks who are teaching people how to be teachers, or education students," says Hunt. "I showed it to a principal, who said to me, 'I want all of my teachers to see this.'

"The show brings up questions for educators," he adds. "How do you deal with homophobia? How do you deal with stereotypes? Is a male makeup artist a role model for children? If one child calls another child a 'faggot' do you stop class and address it?"

Hunt maintains that all of the feedback that he receives has been positive. However, he recognizes the possibility that some conservative groups may be offended by the show's concept.

"There are groups out there who are opposing anti-bullying legislation," he says, "saying that that if you tell little boys to be 'artistic' or to resolve issues without hitting, you're promoting the homosexual agenda. I expect some backlash."

Despite these potential criticisms, Carrie Ruzicka, the Educational and Cultural Programmer at the Stonewall Center, stresses that the show is important for all audiences, including children.

"I've had people ask me, 'Is it appropriate to bring a nine-year-old to this show?'" she says. "I think it is. It's going to be educational – and also entertaining. It's a docu-performance; it's not just talking heads. It appeals to a large audience."

Tickets for "Oliver Button is a STAR!" are $3 for UMass students, $5 for Five College Students, and $7 for the general public.

Serious puppet play

By Sian Wu
Collegian Correspondent

If you liked the eerily realistic puppetry in the movie Being John Malcovich, you may have found yourself at the Japanese Bunraku puppet performance at Rand Theater in the Fine Arts Center on Tuesday night. Unlike the Punch-and-Judy puppets of Western theater that have been consigned to children's shows, Bunraku puppetry in Japan is considered one of the nation's national treasures, and is taken very seriously.

As Bunraku puppetry has regained popularity after its decline in the late 1770's, the international community has also snapped up this art as a unique and beautiful form of expression. The puppets are operated by no less than three black-clad puppeteers at a time, and stand three to four feet tall. The word Bunraku now refers to the three-man style of manipulating Tonda puppets. Their extremely detailed features, such as moving finger joints, rolling eyes, and quivering eyebrows, add to this extremely expressive form of puppetry. A chanter, who sings the narrative of the play, as well as a three-stringed instrument called a samisen also accompany the performance.

Although the narration was not given in English, Tuesday's UMass audience was given a fairly extensive translated demonstration of the techniques used in puppet manipulation by the members of the group. Guests included Jane Marie Law, Professor of Japanese Religions at Cornell University, who gave a pre-concert talk explaining the significance and history of rituals in Bunraku puppetry. Professor Law remarked on the interdisciplinary nature that is inherent in Bunraku puppetry. A performer of Bunraku theater must be well versed in Japanese history, literature, religion, music, and dance because so many of the pieces performed carry significant ritual, religious, or historical weight.

The three pieces performed by the Tonda Traditional Puppet Theater were diverse both in their technique and content. Their first piece, "Sanbaso," is a celebratory dance by a puppet that is an effigy of a Shinto priest. It is a piece often requested to War correspondents

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

War is perhaps one the earliest occurrences of human civilization.

We know this because people told us. Only slightly younger than war is the war story, the tales of valor, pain, fear, courage and sacrifice.

These tales are told to the general public by war correspondents, men and women who decide to risk their lives by entering combat zones armed not with guns and bullets, but with pencils and pads.

Modern war correspondents really began in the Crimean War. Fought in what was then the Turkish Empire in the 1850s, the war was reported on by what is arguably the first modern war correspondent, William Russell. Russell, a reporter for The London Times, covered the battles, and perhaps more importantly, used photography as well as words. His coverage of the wounded inspired English nurse Florence Nightingale to organize and reform the way that military hospitals were run.

During the American Civil War, newspapermen followed both Confederate and Union armies throughout the country, using photography, engravings, and articles to inform the public. Regiments on both sides loved to read features about themselves, often laughing at the inaccuracies in the reporting. The accuracy in troop movements and deployments in the articles worried the generals, however. General Sherman considered spies and reporters to be one in the same. Few things were more highly prized in Confederate headquarters than the latest copy of the Harper's Weekly or Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

In 1896, a monument was dedicated to the memory of 157 journalists, photographers, and artists who covered the war for newspapers. The marble arch is located near Burkittsville, Md.

In World War One, war correspondents covered the horrors of trench warfare, and featured in print such new inventions as the tank.

World War Two was the coming of age, really, for war correspondents. Perhaps the most famous correspondent was Ernie Pyle. Pyle was managing editor for the Washington Daily News, and went to Europe to cover the war in 1940. When America entered the war, Pyle covered the American advances through North Africa, Italy, and France. Living with the soldiers, Pyle knew intimately what it was like for the common GI serving Uncle Sam. When the war in Europe was drawing to a close, Pyle went to the Pacific. It was there, on April 18, 1945, that Ernie Pyle was killed.

In 1950, the Korean War was front-page news. Through the 50s, war correspondents brought the struggle against the Chinese to Mr. and Mrs. Joe Q. Public.

The war, though, that truly changed the way that wars were covered was the Vietnam War. With the advent of television news, and the simple fact that most people had them now, footage of American boys being killed in combat demoralized and frightened the American war effort. The US government could not bolster public support for the war, not when Americans were seeing it, up close and in color, on the evening news.

Vietnam taught the military that the press could not be allowed to cover wars close up anymore. Twenty years later, in the Gulf War, correspondents like Wolf Blitzer reported from miles away, and only what the Defense Department told CNN and other news agencies.

Now, as America faces a new war, the way it will be covered is up to the Defense Department. Only in the future, when historians look back on this war, will we know how wise that decision was.

Clothed Leelee Sobieski and naked Stephen Zahn and Paul Walker star in Joy Ride.

Joy Ride a horror-filled journey

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

JOY RIDE
Starring Leelee Sobieski, Steve Zahn and Paul Walker
Directed by John Dahl
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Joy Ride is the first horror film in a long time that doesn't insult the intelligence of its audience. The plot is plausible (for the most part), and the talented young cast gives their characters a realistic angle. It's a pleasure to see that this fun movie was written by J.J. Abrams, the up-and-coming auteur of the diverse TV-shows "Felicity" and "Alias." He pens an exciting script filled with comedy, teen angst, and mostly edge-of-your-seat tension.

Lewis (Walker) is a Berkley college student who has always had a crush on his friend Venna (Sobieski). When he learns of her break-up with her boyfriend, he trades in his airline ticket home for the holidays and buys an old Jakopy so he can drive her back to New Jersey from her school in Boulder for the break.

Along the way he stops to bail his older brother Fuller (Zahn) out of jail. Fuller has a knack for getting into trouble, and it's his idea to install a CB radio in the Chrysler Newport. They soon cross airwaves with a trucker hearing the handle "Rusty Nail." After they play a cruel practical joke on him, the journey back east becomes a vicious game of cat and mouse.

There are several reasons why Joy Ride is so frightening. One is because of the foreboding and ominous setting on the highways and byways of the American southwest. Road trip movies have always been a good vehicle for horror films, and from the open stretches of road cutting through the lonely desert land to the ramshackle gas stations and seedy motel rooms, the stage is set for terror. The cinematography and lighting effects used on the arid landscape actually make the scenes feel more claustrophobic and enclosed, as opposed to many other films with a similar setting, where the environment feels so large and escapable that there's hardly anything scary at all about the locale. As the mad trucker bears down on his victims, the audience too feels the anxiety of being trapped in such a tight space. It's a sensation that creates the line between camp and horror.

A second diagnosis of the film's high degree of thrills is found in the villain, Rusty Nail. He is cleverly conceived to be the most realistic bad guy to cross the silver screen in a very long time. Creatures from other worlds reeking havoc on humans no longer scare audiences, but rather humans performing monstrous acts to their fellow man are what inspire fear. When Rusty Nail finds out he Is the brunt of the brothers' joke, he gives a very human response and asks why they did it, demanding an apology. When the brothers refuse his request, his switch is flipped and the barrage of violence begins. But Lewis and Fuller can't help but be partially blamed because of their too-proud ego.

It's also a plus to the film that the audience never sees Rusty Nail. In reality, his deep, Bible-belt voice is done by Ted Levine (Silence of the Lambs), while his body is Hollywood ensemble actor Matthew Kimbrough. This fear of the unknown is a quality that many horror movies neglect nowadays, opting instead for visual gross-outs. The most you ever see of him is his greasy fat fist, his flannel shirt and his long, oily hair. Sure, truck driver stereotypes, to be certain - but it works in confirming out fears since we all have seen someone like him driving a big rig. Early on, when Rusty Nail thinks he is talking to a female trucker with the handle Candy Cane, he confesses, "I'm not much to look at." Is he just being hard on himself after being alone on the road for so long, or is he in fact a hideous sight to the eyes? It's never known, and it adds to the audience's heightened apprehension.

Steve Zahn effectively adds a zing of humor to the movie, showing that he can do other forms of film apart from his usual comedies. Zahn, not Walker, is the tragic hero of the movie. His character Fuller has been in jail (for drunk driving, ironically enough) and yet he comes out as the most likeable character in the movie. Zahn never upstages his co-stars but always sells the scenes he is in. He manages to keep his goofy demeanor and dry humor in the film, which is what he does best, while at the same time being equally convincing that he is scared at Rusty Nail's nonstop attack. As his brother, Lewis, Paul Walker gives a performance that is leagues above his role in The Fast & the Furious, and current 'it girl' Leelee Sobieski suits just fine as the damsel in distress.

Road trip movies have always been a good vehicle for horror movies, and director John Dahl (Rounders) does a bang-up job in the driver's seat. He has cultivated a fresh, young cast and a unique script by one of Hollywood's burgeoning talents. This is one horror movie that all others henceforth should try to follow. From the start line to the finish, it is a fun-filled ride that is a cinematic joy.

Christina Milian's new album fails to go beyond the failures of others.

Over the last few years, under-21 female pop stars have been introduced to the pop world with massive exposure. With the explosion of Britney and Christina, an inevitable discharge of teen warblers was unavoidable. Manufactured personas have proliferated to countless album releases. Record labels continue to pop out these cookie cutter personas like, well,.. cookies. The latest release of this type comes from Christina Milian.

Milian is currently riding high on the success of "AM To PM," which has hit big on radio and video. Before making a splash on radio, Milian carved out a niche for herself in other aspects of the arts. Milian is a Cuban-American raised in Waldorf, Maryland who began her career at a young age. One of her first gigs included working on Disney's Channel Movie Surfers. Before igniting her musical journey, Milian appeared on several TV shows, such as "Clueless," and "Charmed." She has also done a voice-over character role in A Bug's Life, as well as an appearance in the film The Wood.

Milian first hit the musical airwaves with the Ja Rule hit "Between Me and You." "AM To PM" is an irresistibly catchy house song that is dance pop at its finest and stands as the best track on the self-titled album. The stabbing keyboard lines, aggressive lyrics, club-rhythm, and heavy-bass lines make the song a standout. It's nothing we haven't heard before, but at least it's produced with artistic ingenuity that allows us the bypass the derivative production. Other than the lead single, however, urban pop-tarts shroud the album with little to no substance.

Where 19-year-old Milian exerts fierce vocal effect and carves out an aggressive persona on the lead single, she lacks in the remainder of the album. This Latina has received recognition from fellow Latina - Jennifer Lopez. Milian co-wrote Lopez's hit "Play", an attribute her record label shouldn't trumpet too loudly. After all, Lopez's musical escapades have been less than thrilling. In fact, Milian displays many of Lopez's characteristics on the album a flimsy voice, brainless lyrics, poor melodies, and less than stellar hooks. Simply put, this artist isn't One-in-a-Milian.

"You Make Me Laugh" opens with the "Sticks and stone might break my bones, your words will never hurt me" line. Yeah, like we've never heard that one before. Even worse, the track bears laughable giggles behind Milian's vocals.

There are many times when Milian tries to bring soul to the album but fails. Milian sings about a broken heart on "It Hurts When," as she tries to convey emotion but falls short with her poor vocals. Her voice is barely audible on "Satisfaction Guaranteed," which coincidentally has the same back track as "When You Look At Me." If the consumers' satisfaction is guaranteed, then he will be demanding his money back.

There is one other notable track "When You Look at Me." Milian preaches "looks can be deceiving" to a thug. The opening melody and laid back groove create a catchiness factor the other tracks lack. Her aggressive vocals works better on tracks like this instead of when her sappy voice drenches the gooey ballads.

Christina Milian is the cheesy Latin pop fluff we've unfortunately heard enough of. If you can't get enough of "AM To PM" buy the single—shelling out the bucks for the album isn't worth it.

be performed at weddings and other celebrations around Japan, a fact that was made well known to us by the puppet-master.

The second piece, "Naruto," revealed the tragic and highly emotional stories that are often associated with Puppet Theater. It told the story of a mother and daughter, who had been separated years earlier when she and her samurai husband fled to Osaka on a secret mission for his lord. Upon the unexpected reunion of the mother and daughter, the soon-to-be jailed mother must face the choice of taking her own daughter in and thus risking her life, or send her away, and never see her again. Many audience members found themselves pulling out their handkerchiefs despite themselves during this piece, and were ready for the more humorous nature of the third piece, "Hidakagawa Iriaizakura."

The last piece offered perhaps the most complex of puppet heads from the six puppets that were featured in the show. A woman pursuing a rather indifferent lover comes across a river in her journey, and attempts to convince the boatman across the river to bring her over the water. She eventually turns into a raging demon, complete with dropped jaw, and yellow, rolled back eyes as she finally swims across the river. This story also relates a rather didactic Buddhist teaching us, so we may learn, as Professor Law remarked, "what all that attachment will do to a person."

The Bunraku puppet performance was given as one of the many shows put on every semester by the Asian Dance and Music Program.

American Werewolf and Evil Dead II: equally scary and amusing

AMERICAN WEREWOLF IN LONDON

By Christopher Kenny
Collegian Correspondent

AMERICAN WEREWOLF IN LONDON

It is rather common for the horror genre to utilize the element of comedy in film - Tales From the Crypt and Elvira illustrate this. Even Freddy Krueger became a kind of perverse jester as the Nightmare on Elm Street movies progressed. Uncommon, however, are movies that succeed in this cross-pollination. What results, more often then not, from combining horror and humor is a movie that is neither frightening nor funny. The balance is very difficult to achieve. One movie, however, that has successfully joined the two is the 1980 movie American Werewolf in London, a humorous and witty film that still maintains macabre elements.

Filmmaker John Landis, whose previous movies included huge comedic hits like Blues Brothers and Animal House, directed the movie. The story begins with Americans David Kessler (David Naughton) and Jack Goodman (Griffin Dunne) backpacking through the moors of North England the night of a full moon. Despite warnings from the eccentric locals, David and Jack wander off the road and are subsequently attacked by a large wolf; Jack is killed and David is bitten. Soon Jack's apparition is coming back to warn David that he will be going through a change on the next full moon and that he should kill himself before it is too late.

This might sound like typical horror movie fare but the true innovation comes with the way that the director can juxtapose the horror with the humorous and absurd. One instance is when Jack, whose ghostly state retains the ghastly wounds left by the werewolf, laments over the fact that a crush from his hometown, upset over his death, finds solace in another's bed. Dunne's comedic intonation mixed with his horrifying appearance makes this a very unique scene. In another odd scenario, David finds refuge from the full moon in a porno theatre, where he is confronted with the ghosts of his victims, who cheerfully give him advice on methods of suicide while watching a hilarious porno flick. It is this overlapping of the humor and the macabre, evenly balanced by Landis, that makes the movie work so well.

The movie's visual effects are groundbreaking, as well, particularly David's traumatic change. His fingers extend into giant paws, his face contorts into a snout, and hair grows exponentially throughout his body in what is seen today as a landmark in special effects. The effects in the movie, this changing scene being the crown jewel the visual effect sequences, earned Rick Baker (whose most recent credits include make-up work for Planet of the Apes) an Oscar.

But perhaps the strongest aspect of the movie isn't what it shows but what it chooses not to reveal to the viewer. A clear view of the werewolf is always elusive. Like the victims, the audiences only catch fleeting glimpses that are just enough to spark an active imagination. At one point, the werewolf stalks a man through a London subway shaft; the whole time, however, we travel through the maze of tunnels through the predator's point of view. We see the man before us looking over his shoulder, running hurriedly, and panicking as the "camera" catches up to him. This technique is amazingly effective in stimulating the imagination of the viewer: one could imagine the snarling, man-beast that the man saw without having seen it at all.

There are other plot elements as well, involving the nurse who falls in love with David and the doctor who investigates David's wolf attack, trying to make sense of it all. All these characters, including Jack's all-too-human ghost, form a cast that is very unique. They all contribute to the task of making the audience legitimately like and care for David, ultimately hoping he somehow overcomes his doomed existence.

American Werewolf in London is the best werewolf movie ever made. That isn't saying much when compared to rest of the God-awful lycanthrope movies out there. Landis manages to transcend that genre and make a thoroughly entertaining movie about a culturally displaced American who just happens to howl at the moon and rip London citizens apart. As far as those types of movies go, this is the best of its kind.

DUELING 80's FLICKS

Evil Dead II

"Conceptually Evil Dead 2 is a really scary movie. Alas visually, the film is comparable to a bunch of Muppets snorting Special K and eating each other."

By Tim Letteney
Collegian Staff

EVIL DEAD 2

In light of Bruce Campbell's upcoming visit to Mount Holyoke, I figured I should focus on one of his most entertaining films. Evil Dead 2 is a fast paced, surprisingly well directed, cult, camp, horror flic. The Evil Dead trilogy is so good in fact that many fans cannot separate Bruce the actor from Bruce the person...ahh fame. The director of all three films (Sam Raimi) has graduated into mainstream success with films like A Simple Plan, For the Love of the Game, and the upcoming Spider-Man feature.

Evil Dead 2 is often labeled a remake of The Evil Dead. It isn't. I don't want to argue the point because I don't really care that much. The plot flows like this: Ash (Bruce), and his girlfriend go off to a remote cabin in the woods for a long night of hot lovemaking...or so I imagine. Sadly Ash fumbles into and turns on an old Panasonic recorder. The tape spins, ancient Candorian chants are recited, Ash looks confused, and the dead are awakened and...well...evil. The rest of the film deals with Ash fighting his dead girlfriend, going insane, lopping off his hand with a chainsaw, and fighting possessed yuppies in tennis shirts. Man, this is a good film.

Conceptually Evil Dead 2 is a really scary movie. Alas visually, the film is comparable to a bunch of Muppets snorting Special K and eating each other. Though the self-reflexive cheese makes this film a great success. For it's cheesy film, realizes it is cheesy...it is no longer cheesy...it is an inventive cult classic. Evil Dead 2 is an inventive cult classic.

Bruce's performance of this cocky moron is flawless...a bit too flawless. Amusingly enough Ash speaks only in catch phrases...really. Every single utterance can be quoted and spoofed on when with friends who won't judge you.

Evil Dead 2 can easily be seen as an intelligent parody of a big budget, poorly written, action flick - or it can be seen as a poorly written, low budget, action flick - it is really up to you. Either way you look at it, the film is immensely enjoyable. Don't rent this film; buy this film. It seems like it was only yesterday when I set up my room freshman year and was just about to hide my copies of Evil Dead, Evil Dead 2, and Army of Darkness under my bed, when three kids came to the door. And they were all cried. You have all of the Evil Dead films?!?! Say who knows? Maybe your friends will like it. Mine did. And if for some odd chance your friends don't like it...just remember we were better off alone anyway. Enjoy.

Bruce Campbell is speaking and signing his new book "If Chins Could Kill, Life of a B-movie Actor" at 1 p.m. Sunday, Oct. 14 at Mount Holyoke College.

In August, the Minutemen went to Greece for a one-week, four-game escapade with two Grecian National teams – a trip Lappas had planned while still in the ranks at Villanova.

Under NCAA regulations, schools are allowed to take a European trip once every four years. But before launch, the school is also allowed ten practice days prior to the trip. Lappas used eight of those August days to familiarize the new team with its new system. But he doesn't see that head-start as such a massive gain.

"I don't feel like we're ahead of the game. I feel like we're ahead of where we would have been," said Lappas, who, despite popular belief, won't be participating the Coca-Cola/Big Y Coaches vs. Students 3-on-3 Tournament tonight. "It'll be a little easier just having them know what warm-up drills we're doing and things like that, but we've still got a lot to do without a doubt."

Things will begin slow in the Lappas camp, but they will pick up soon enough. On Nov. 4, the Minutemen play in the first of their two exhibition games.

"It's pretty basic," said Lappas about his practice schedule for the first couple of weeks. "We intertwine a lot of team things with drills. We have to work on fundamentals but at the same time get an offense ready, get a defense ready and all that stuff."

The doors of the Mullins Center open at 10:30 tonight. At 12:01, the newest family in this town will be introduced. It's easy to see that its father is rather passionate in his work. But will it rub off on his children, of sorts, to help rebuild the UMass tradition?

The UMass men's tennis team's next game is on Tuesday against URI.

Men's tennis outduels Lord Jeffs

By Elena Panesis
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team learned the value of the old saying "what a difference a day makes" as it rebounded from its 6-1 loss on Tuesday to Hartford University by dominating the Amherst College Wednesday with a 5-2 win. The majority of the squad played with more aggression and a fiery competitive edge in comparison to the previous day, which ranks high in Coach Judy Dixon's playbook.

Amherst	2

"We came out more fiery from the beginning of the match," said Dixon. "Eric Reblin played tremendously well in doubles. Both Steve and Eric play with a lot of fire and we need that. It really helped us out in doubles."

In doubles play the tandem of senior Todd Champeau and junior Eric Reblin breezed past their Lord Jeff's opponents with an 8-1 victory. The Minutemen went on to win the crucial doubles point, which set the tone for the rest of the match by giving them much needed confidence.

"In doubles me and Rebs [Eric Reblin] played really well," said Champeau. "It was the best match that we've played together all year."

After the boost provided by the doubles win, the Maroon and White played with energy and momentum in its singles play. No.1 Steve Prisco continued his string of success with a 6-2, 6-4 stomping of his longtime friend Bryan Wexler. Freshman Scott Sans-Leeb scored a win for his record 6-2, 7-6 over Amherst's Rob Feeley. Veteran Phil Rodrigues looked strong as he prevailed 6-4, 6-2 against Will Abbott after coming back from an injured hand in the Hartford match. The star of the match, Reblin, played with tremendous emotion and showed after some mediocre performances that he has what it takes to succeed in Division I tennis.

"I feel really good about the match," said Reblin. "It was a total reversal from my performance against Hartford which was 'nuthin nice'".

With a solid win under its belt the UMass squad answered many of Dixon's questions about its current level of play. Though the team will relish the win, Dixon still needs better performances out of her freshmen Reid Stubbs and Sans-Leeb in order to seriously contend for the Atlantic 10 title in the spring.

"Reid and Scott are both work in progresses. With Reid I need to work on proper shot selection," said Dixon. "Scott needs to stay positive and aggressive especially when he's ahead. He was ahead 6-2, 5-0 and he double faulted. These are all freshmen mistakes and I'd rather have them happen now so that when we play UConn, we won't have to deal with those same mistakes."

To work on its weaknesses, Dixon has two more practices scheduled for the remainder of the week. However, to celebrate its victory against Amherst she and assistant Coach Scott Wilkins planned to have a little fun yesterday before getting down to business.

"I'm really glad that we got some more fire out of the team today," said Dixon. "I don't know if they were scared of me or just angry after their loss to Hartford. Anyway, we plan to have an easier practice [Thursday]. It should be fun for the guys. Friday will be enjoyable too because we have some alumni coming."

The next big challenge for the Minutemen takes place Tuesday against the Rams of Rhode Island University. However, the Minutemen almost consider it preparation for their key home match on Oct. 23 against a bitter rival that needs avenging-the Huskies of Connecticut.

"As long as we stay positive and confident things are definitely going to fall into place for us when we play URI and UConn," said Champeau. "We hate them and they hate us. One of my good friends from home is actually on the team but when we play there's no love. It should be a good match with a really rowdy crowd."

Spartans/Wolverines compete outside

By J. Brady McCollough
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

EAST LANSING, Mich. – The Michigan hockey team was 47 seconds – and one clearing of the puck – away from exiting Spartan Stadium with an upset victory over its arch-rival Michigan State, the No. 1 team in the nation.

At the third-period check rolled under one netting, the Wolverines held a 3-2 advantage over the Spartans, who pulled junior goalie Ryan Miller to set up a four-on-five attempt to tie the game.

Down one man, Michigan failed to clear the puck thanks to the awareness of Michigan State junior defenseman Brad Ezzo, who held the puck in his zone and fired it at Michigan goalie Josh Blackburn. A scramble for the rebound ensued, and was finally controlled by Spartan freshman forward Eric Nystrom. Just the puck in the only place it could have gone to score his first collegiate goal with the game at three apiece.

"I wanted to celebrate a little more," said Nystrom, who was corralled by senior captain Adam Hall after putting the puck past Blackburn.

"It was just a scramble. I figured I'd get it [on net] and he kicked like [a goal] off mine. I've never scored a [game] winner in hockey before, in my life. Obviously, [since] that's the way it went, he kicked it [in], so, whatever. He [got] the puck, so [scoring] counts."

"It's never ideal to tie against Michigan State," Michigan senior forward Mike Cammalleri said. "We put a good effort forth, and that's what we're proud of. We're proud of the heart, determination and character that we showed."

"No[body] hung their head when they scored the goal, and we knew we still had a shot to win the game," Michigan sophomore defenseman Andy Burnes said. "We weren't going to let them win the game."

Less than 30 seconds into the first period, Michigan junior Josh Gorges was called for tripping. One minute later, Nystrom was called for slashing, setting up a two-man advantage for the Spartans.

The Wolverines killed the three-on-five, but were unable to hold Michigan State scoreless. Shortly after the first penalty expired, Hall skated free and slid the puck past Blackburn for the first goal of the game.

Michigan State's second goal of the game was very similar to its first. After a charging penalty on Michigan freshman forward Michael Woodford, Burnes was called for his second [illegible] penalty at the game – both giving the Spartans a two-man advantage midway through the third period. This time, Michigan State took advantage of the three-on-five, as freshman defenseman Dan Boyle found Keith shot the puck past Blackburn to the point, tying the game at two.

"I guess [the calls] were questionable calls," said Michigan coach Red Berenson in regard to the two slashing penalties called on Burnes. "I was really surprised that they were called. But [since] he didn't even slash the guy – he just put [illegible] shoulder and actually got the puck off him. I guess they found a slash from the ref's point of view, but [illegible] standing they were both questionable Player of the Week award.

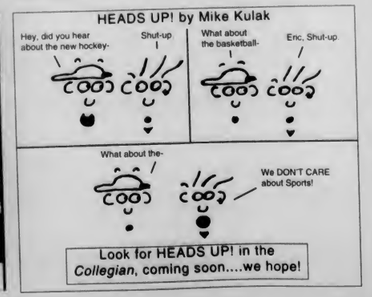
Rudy had nothing but praise for Dukes' midfielder Lauren Bracco, an A-10 Preseason All-Conference Team selection.

"We tried desperately to recruit Lauren Bracco," Rudy said. "She's tough. I like her very much. She is big in the air and tough in the tackle."

Positioned toward the front with Bracco will be senior Abbie Burns and junior Erin Marshall. The two upperclassmen have combined for nine goals on 18 shots in 2001.

"[Those three] will be a tough package [to deal with]," Rudy said.

Yes, the two teams the Minutemenwomen are playing are a combined 4-12-3 on the season, but this is not an easy weekend by any means.



"It doesn't matter what their record is, they play everyone tight," Rudy said, pointing out that last year, Duquesne played in 15 one-goal games and one tie.

Rudy knows that, during in-conference games, anything can, and will happen. Don't expect him to let his team forget that either.

"We respect everybody," Rudy said. "We have to because every game is so important [at this stage of the season]. We can't afford to have upsets, letdowns, or poor performances."

Minutewomen ready for Totman double-dip

By Jim Pignatello
Collegian Staff

Knee deep in the Atlantic 10 conference schedule, the Massachusetts women's soccer team will play two games at home this weekend for the last time in the month of October.

Coach Jim Rudy's squad will face off against two teams that have beaten UMass just one time each in 13 total meetings.

Both Duquesne and St. Bonaventure have struggled through most of the 2001 season. The Bonnies are an atrocious 2-7-1 overall (1-2 A-10) and will ride into Amherst this afternoon on the heels of a woeful five game losing streak that has seen them outscored 13-3.

Sophomore forward Lisa Nicola will pack the most offensive punch for St. Bonaventure. After finishing second on the team in scoring as a freshman last year, the Canton, Ohio native is leading the team in goals as a sophomore. In fact, her four scores have accounted for half of the total goals scored by the Bonnies all season long.

"Lisa is a really quick, smaller player," Rudy said. "We are really concerned about her."

But memories of a Halloween 1999 1-0 loss at home to the Bonnies are keeping Rudy busy. In that game, then-sophomore goalkeeper Karen Cunningham and the team's defensive system earned the win, despite being outplayed by the Minutewomen.

"[She] played spectacularly [in the '99 match]," Rudy said. "They shut us out with a low-pressure sort of defense."

The low-pressure, drop-back St. Bonaventure defense is tailor-made to extinguish the flames typically created in UMass's fast-paced, forward-pushing offense.

"We usually pack the other teams into their own end, but this may be their choice," Rudy said. "We like to go forward, we want to go forward. We are real concerned about that."

Standout senior Brooke Bartlett will be as crucial as ever for the Maroon and White offense to get on the board. The midfielder's deadly passing accuracy will help set her teammates up for shots and slice through the stingy Bonnie defense.

Sunday afternoon's matchup against Duquesne should get physical. The Dukes were called for 16 fouls in a 3-0 win over Temple last week that snapped the team's four-game losing streak.

The match-ups for the Duquesne game will be similar to the St. Bonaventure game in that both teams are likely to react to the Maroon and White offense similarly.

"They are used to absorbing pressure and they have a great goalkeeper," Rudy said.

Dukes' goalie Kristin Scharphorn had an amazing streak of road games last week. The junior made 28 saves, en route to the win over Temple and a 1-1 tie against St. Joseph's. Scharphorn allowed just one goal en route to winning the A-10

O'Brien, Minutemen shutting down offenses

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

There is a transitive property in sports that states the following: playing great defense results in frustration for your opponent. Once the opponent is frustrated, the edge is won and success is near. This is why coaches consistently use the weary cliché: "defense wins championships."

All season long the Massachusetts men's soccer team has suffocated its opponents – allowing only 10 goals go through its net in nine games. That is a remarkable 1.1 goals allowed per game. The stifling defense has surely led to success as the Minutemen stand at 6-3 at the mid-way point of the season.

Last weekend, the Minutemen blanked two fellow Atlantic 10 opponents, Fordham 1-0 and La Salle 3-0. The double-dose of shutouts improved their Atlantic 10 mark to 2-1.

This weekend the Maroon and White will test its excellent defensive play on the road when it faces off with the St. Bonaventure Bonnies (6-4, 2-1 A-10) in New York on Friday and the Duquesne Dukes (3-3, 1-2 A-10) in Pittsburgh on Sunday.

The catalyst behind the strong UMass backfield has been senior goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn.

In the Minutemen's last five contests, O'Quinn has shutout four of the team's opponents. Last week's victory over La Salle gave the veteran co-captain his 13th career shutout – moving him to second place on the school's all-time shutout list. He is now two behind the number one record holder, Sam Ginzburg who held fort between the posts during the years of 1985-1988.

With two shutouts this weekend, O'Quinn could return home to Amherst as the new career shutout record leader.

The Bonnies are coming off a hard-fought 3-2 victory over A-10 foe Temple on Sunday. The win snapped St. Bonaventure's two-game losing streak and gave them much needed confidence going into an anticipated tough match with UMass.

Duquesne faces off with the elite of the A-10 this weekend. Friday they face off with the team that is predicted to finish first in the A-10, Rhode Island. Then on Sunday they duel with the Minutemen.

In order to defeat these two Atlantic 10 foes, the Maroon and White will need to perform a balanced game by continuing its invigorating defense and produce timely scoring attacks.

Stories are stretched this weekend

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

You're better off not trying to figure this one out on your own. Just sit there and try to look interested.

Not too much about the Massachusetts field hockey team's first conference action of the season makes sense. The Minutewomen (3-7) will soon make sense. The Minutewomen (3-7) will board a bus today and depart for Pennsylvania with a weekend double-dip on their agenda; that much we know for certain. From there it gets tricky.

First, there's the conference itself. The Atlantic 10. Probably made up of 10 East Coast schools, right? Wrong. When it comes to field hockey at least, the A-10 is comprised of not 10, or nine or even eight teams. Try seven.

"Last year, there were only six," said senior Kaitlyn Byron. "So it should be a little tougher this year."

The first of UMass's conference opponents will be La Salle (2-9), which hosts the Maroon and White in a 10 a.m. Saturday game. This Philadelphia school has adopted the nickname of "Explorers," due to the extensive travels that its teams must endure. The mark of a La Salle team has always been that it will go anywhere in search of top-notch competition.

Hence the field hockey team playing six of its first eight games at home. What do they do, move their home field before each game? How on Earth does this constitute exploring?

La Salle's field hockey express is piloted by first-year coach Sarah Catlin. This former Bucknell star made quite a name for herself last season, when she guided Susquehanna to a 12-5 record and the regular-season MAC league title.

In lacrosse.

"I guess they're both running games, possession games," said Byron. "But I don't know how much one really has to do with the other."

Apparently not too much. The Explorers have been outscored 19-1 over their last eight games, all defeats. But they haven't lost a lacrosse game yet this season.

Sunday brings another showdown for the Minutewomen, this one at noon against West Chester University. West Chester is another school located, contrary to its name, in the eastern part of the Keystone State. Its field hockey team (6-5), nicknamed the Golden Rams, will actually begin conference play on Saturday when it hosts Rhode Island. As in the URI Rams.

If you can find a bookie who takes action on field hockey, grab this inside tip from Byron and run with it. "I'd have to go with the Rams in that one," laughed the Greenfield native.

The male goats of the bright yellow metallic variety are powered by three main spark plugs: Kristin Schulberger, Jill Posen and Kendra Wood. West Chester also plays on grass, which "gives the younger players an advantage" according to Byron.

Senior Schulberger leads the team in scoring with four goals on 12 shots. Junior Posen has taken twice as many shots and scored half as many goals. Freshman Wood has launched 10 shots and has yet to find the net even once.

So much for finding the logic in the Minutewomen's first A-10 trip. Here's hoping they at least send us a nice postcard.

The UMass field hockey team heads to Pennsylvania this weekend for two conference matchups.

Burn, baby, burn

Minutemen, freshmen will feel the heat in season opener vs. UNH

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

In many ways a hockey coach is like a parent. Some bench leaders nuzzle and coddle their toddling teams until they are ready for the pressure of the big time. While other coaches subscribe to the Don "Tool" Cahoon method of trial by fire.

"You know going in that the young kids are going to be a little nervous," Cahoon said. "There is nothing you can say to change that."

A young but gifted UMass hockey squad will feel the heat on Saturday, as it goes beak to beak with the Niagara Purple Eagles in front of a hostile but safe Mullins Center crowd.

UMass vs. Niagra
Saturday, 7 p.m.

In a continuing campaign to draw interest from the surrounding communities the Mass Attack has labeled its home opener public safety night, and policemen, firefighters and their families will receive free admission.

The Minutemen, however, are trying to make their home ice consistently unsafe for the opposition that is for the first time since the program's reinvention in 1993.

In eight years the UMass hockey program has gone 49-64-15 at the Mullins Center – not exactly a home ice advantage. But with the rich hockey tradition in the state of Massachusetts and the slumbering animal that is the UMass hockey culture, the ML should become very unfriendly in no time.

The first step though is a win against College Hockey America's Niagara. The Purple Eagles will be dangerous as they return nearly their entire roster except for a quad of graduated players and a head coach.

Former Niagara headman Blaise MacDonald moved on to UMass Lowell after taking home CHA coach of year honors in 2000. But beyond him and four graduating seniors, the Eagles remain stacked.

All seven of NU's top scorers return including Bernie Scorsi (11g, 17a), Hannu Kattu (12g, 11a) and Chris Welch (12g, 6a). The Eagles are similar to UMass in that they have a very balanced attack but no big time producer. They may also be comparable to the Minutemen in style of play, which would lead to a very entertaining game.

"I think they are going to be a transition team with a lot of grit," Cahoon said. "If so this should be a very exciting game for people to watch."

But as much as scouting a team can help improve the chances of success in Cahoon's case, he is more concerned about the performance of his team, not someone else's. In that sense the special teams facet of the game is a major key and concern for the home squad.

"To be successful we need to kill penalties," Cahoon said. "We need to win the special teams battle and hopefully generate some offense on the power play."

If any single piece of the Mass Attack could be classified as meager it was special teams. The Minutemen was abysmal on the power play and the picture wasn't much prettier on the short handed side of the puck.

If anything the Minutemen will sport a new look on Saturday night. Not new sweaters like last year's squad, but fresh faces in the form of eleven freshman. Four of the eight new forwards will see significant time up front.

After the entire scoring line of Tim Turner (Jr., 26 points in 2000-01), Jimmy Callahan (Jr., 18 points) and Thomas Peck (So., 12 points), the lineup will look even younger. A pair of rocks, Greg Mauldin and Justin Rafferty will join senior Martin Miljko to form another quality trio.

Rafferty is as smooth as they come, as far as slick skating, puck threading centers go. Mauldin adds a size/speed combo to the mix while Miljko brings the artillery with maybe the best shot in hockey East.

Cahoon's so-called energy line brings out the vets with Brad Nizwantowski, Darcy King and Mike Warner. The final line includes Colorado Avalanche draftee Scott Horvath (6'3", 228) and freshman Peter Trovato (6'0", 200). Those two mountain peaks are valleys if by rookie center Tim Vitek.

With a great core of returnees and a crew of ice burning recruits, the Minutemen will at least have the talent to chase down and de-wing their opponent. The question remains though, will the rooks clammy hands let the Eagles flip right through their fingers? Tune in Saturday night at 7 pm.

The witching hour

Lappas-era begins tonight

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

It's not really a catchphrase. It's actually more of a blueprint than anything else.

"Passion, Family, Tradition."

Those three words have been chosen to pursue the Massachusetts men's basketball team throughout the 2001-02 season.

"You know, it's kind of what I've always believed in," said Head Coach Steve Lappas last night, after a team meeting in the Mullins Center. "You build a program based on those three things."

Tomorrow at 12 a.m., the Lappas-era officially begins in this little Western Massachusetts town. No longer is Amherst marked by the leader named "Bruiser" who vowed to "Bring it On."

As scores of UMass faithful will sense tonight during the Minutemen's version of Midnight Madness, the new boss has begun to install his plan for reform.

So it seems, now are the times of Maroon and White hoop restoration. Now are the times of UMass' climb back to a national level of respect.

"I can help with the passion, the tradition is already here, and then the family, that's something else I can help with," said Lappas, referring back to his newest adage. "So if we can get everyone buying into those three things and taking pride in those three things, then we have a chance to be good."

Still, the fresh look of UMass will not have a chance to establish itself until Nov. 16 when Arkansas-Little Rock visits the Mullins Center for the Minutemen's first regular season game in the Lappas regime.

At present, it's all just hype.

But that is why Midnight Madness even exists. It is a one-night version of basketball rapture. It doesn't matter where you attend. Tomorrow morning, college basketball arenas around the country will erupt at the witching hour and applaud whichever team happens to be on its respective hardwood.

"This is just about the guys having a good time and enjoying it," Lappas said. "This thing is about hype. I just want to see all of the fans get excited and have the guys feel like they're getting a tremendous amount of support. That's what is important.

"But I'm more concerned about Saturday," Lappas continued, alluding to the actual significance of the madness this coming midnight.

On Saturday at 12 a.m., the NCAA will officially take its hold off every college basketball team around the country, as it does every year around this time.

At 3 p.m. tomorrow, Lappas and crew will take to the Curry Hicks Cage for their first practice since the fading weeks of the summer. Since then, the squad has worked on its strength and conditioning, and has conducted daily pick-up games at the Cage.

On Sunday, practice is scheduled for 1 p.m. And Monday, it's on again.

"We have to give one day off a week due to NCAA rules," Lappas said. "But we're going to be doing some long ones in the next couple of weeks."

Minutemen hurting for first victory

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

The theme may be getting old for coach Mark Whipple and his Massachusetts football squad but going into an all important conference game on Saturday, the key factor will continue to be health.

One would think that with an 0-4 record and homecoming on the horizon, the primary concern would be this weekend's opponent, the New Hampshire Wildcats.

But with a rash of injuries to pertinent players such as fullback Pete Cariello, linebacker/defensive back Anton McKenzie and LB/long-snapper Jeremy Cain, Whipple is thinking more about the medical ward than the gridiron.

UMass vs. UNH
Saturday, 1 p.m.

"We don't know about McKenzie, we don't know about Cain and we don't know about Cariello," Whipple said.

It will be a struggle to begin with, as UMass regularly fields one of the youngest teams in the country. But with the loss of such veteran players, it will be even more difficult to satisfy the homecoming crowd against the offensively talented Wildcats (3-2).

The 'Cats are led by deadly accurate quarterback Ryan Day. The senior signal caller broke the 6,000-yard mark for his career last week and will look to add on to that total against the Minutemen.

"Their main guy is Ryan Day, he has played superbly all year," Whipple said.

Day has passed for 1,217 yards in only five games this year but he may not be the most lethal menace on the UNH attack.

In last year's 24-16 smacking of the Minutemen, UNH tailback Stephen Lewis ran roughshod over the Maroon and White. He walked away with the Bill Knight trophy for the Most Outstanding Player in the annual UMass-UNH game. Lewis brought the award back to Durham for the first time since Jerry Azumah won it in 1997.

He will be licking his chops at a porous UMass run defense, especially if Cain and McKenzie are unable to go on Saturday.

But no matter what the 'Cats do on offense, it won't make a difference unless the UMass offense scores its first touchdown since the second game of the season.

The task of putting points on the board will again fall on the shoulders of redshirt freshman quarterback Matt Guice and the passing game.

"If we can throw the ball better, which we've worked on this week, than I think it'll be a good game," Whipple said.

The lone bright spot in the Minutemen's winless start has been senior receiver DeShon Hardy. Hardy has already snared 21 passes in the team's first four games, as compared to the 27 caught all year in 2000. The senior has been a guiding light for a young a quarterback who is still trying to get comfortable in his starting role.

Library faces budget cuts to reference collection

By Tom Ollila
Collegian Correspondent

The W.E.B. Dubois Library will be forced to cut 20 to 30 percent of its serials budget and the same amount of its book budget for this upcoming year.

The decision was made following the news of a reduction from $14 million to $11 million in the state budget's Education and Reference Materials line item. This means a cut of at least $1 million in the library's acquisitions budget.

When asked why the library is faced with a full third of the overall budget cut, Emily Silverman, Communication Public Info/Communications Specialist, said, "[the UMass Amherst library] receives one third of the total budget, so when there has to be a cut, we face one third of it."

The cut is having an immediate impact on many journals with subscriptions currently up for renewal. According to Jay Schafer, Coordinator of Collection Development, "The library has over $3 million worth of journal subscriptions which are on an annual-renewal basis. If we don't cancel the journals, the publishers will assume they are being renewed." While this seems like a high cost for journals, some have huge subscription costs.

For example, Schafer said, "There is one brain research journal that costs $17,000 a year."

The library now faces the dilemma of deciding which journals to cut. An evaluation in 1999 provides much of the information currently under review.

According to Schafer, "A projected shortfall in '99 forced us to have departments and faculty go through a review process to pick journals to cut. We didn't have to implement the cut, because we were granted the money back around Thanksgiving."

Going into greater detail on the journal budget, Schafer explained that the library often has to evaluate subscriptions because its budget can't keep up with inflation in subscription costs. He explained the increase when he said, "Every two fiscal years we have to cut again just because of the five to ten percent inflation."

Book acquisition will suffer a similar amount with the new cuts.

"This will especially affect the humanities and social sciences which rely on books much more," according to Schafer. "This loss, however, is much more invisible because you can't see books we don't have."

In order to continue providing students with the materials they need, the library is currently looking at expanding its electronic document delivery programs. Unfortunately, much of the electronic document delivery programs actually cost more.

"That's the irony," said Schafer, "publishers need to maintain their revenue stream."

In addition, much of the electronic document delivery system is only available to faculty and graduate students who can use it to access full text articles. By using this system, the library will only have to pay for articles accessed, therefore possibly saving money over subscription costs. The library is evaluating different ways to protect undergraduates within its new budget.

One program the library plans to use in protecting undergraduates has been around for years: interlibrary loans in which several libraries worldwide have a no-charge agreement for sharing articles.

Silverman discussed one such program called RAPID, "With RAPID, student usually receive requested materials in 24-48 hours in .pdf format."

She also went into detail on several other resources already available to students. For example, since October 1, students have been able to chat online with librarians from 1:00 to 3:00 Monday through Friday. They hope to expand the hours next month. Also, several databases can be accessed online from the library's website at www.library.umass.edu.

Activists oppose civil discrimination

By Bill Larkin
Collegian Staff

An author, a union president and two gay rights activists spoke to nearly 50 people at the Unitarian Society of Northampton and Florence in Northampton on National Coming Out Day on Thursday, Oct. 11.

At "Social Justice and Same Sex Marriage: A United Response to the Right Agenda," the four speakers informed the audience about the unified campaign opposing two anti-gay Massachusetts constitutional ballot initiatives. The measures, filed Aug. 1 by the Massachusetts Citizens for Marriage, would prohibit state and local governments from extending rights and benefits to unmarried couples and families.

Diane Palladino, a representative from RightWATCH, an organization that monitors the activities of the radical right, introduced the "presentation focusing on social justice, not just GLBT issues."

Gary Buseck, the Executive Director of Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD), told the audience about the legal context and history of the same-sex marriage movement.

Although the Massachusetts legislature has "bottled up Defense of Marriage (DOMA) statutes for the past two years," Buseck said GLAD sought review in the Mass. Supreme Judicial Court in September to oppose Attorney General Thomas Reilly's certification of two "DOMA-based" constitutional ballot initiatives. The lawsuit aside, voters will decide on the initiatives in a 2004 referendum if 50 members of the Massachusetts legislature approve the initiatives in 2002 and again in 2003.

After criticizing the validity of referenda and direct democracies, Buseck provided examples of the benefits the constitutional amendments would deny spouses of same-sex marriages. If the state "freezes benefits into place" by approving the initiatives, Buseck said spouses of deceased city employees would not receive workers compensation benefits or pension dividends.

"We need to keep this off the ballot," Buseck said. "Although most constitutional amendments are supposed to be constitutionally vague, we fear the chaos these initiatives will invite."

James Shaw, president of the United Auto Workers (UAW), emphasized the potential synergy of labor and GLAD campaigns to ensure the "equal rights of all."

Shaw said that the Graduate Employees Organization (GEO) at the University of Massachusetts, a union of over 2,500 graduate-student teachers, represents the only Massachusetts union that has earned health benefits for employees married to a member of the same sex. In addition, the UAW has achieved health benefits for similar employees at Ford, General Motors and the Miller Brewing Co.

"The same conservative movement that opposes same-sex marriages will oppose workers rights," Shaw said. "Therefore, a coalition is necessary to represent all the interests in a democracy."

Although only "13 percent of workers participate in unions," Shaw called the audience to "help use the infrastructure inherent to unions to alter the political landscape by supporting progressive candidates who will push for both gay and union rights."

Frederick Clarkson, author of Eternal Hostility: The Struggle Between Theocracy and Democracy, provided an overview of the groups and individuals behind the constitutional amendment.

According to Clarkson, the Catholic Church and social conservatives spearhead the anti-gay marriage campaign across the country threatening the progressive lifestyle. GLAD faces a three-and-a-half year struggle against organizations working from religious, political and financial motivations, Clarkson said.

"Amherst is not used to such campaigns against civil rights," Clarkson

Berkeley students censure school newspaper

By Wendy Lee
Daily Californian (U. California-Berkeley)

(U-WIRE) BERKELEY, Calif. – After heated debate, the ASUC Senate passed a symbolic bill late Wednesday night with an 11-7 vote condemning The Daily Californian for printing a political cartoon. The bill asks for a front-page apology and mandatory sensitivity training for the newspaper staff because of a cartoon critics have called racist. ASUC Senator Tony Falcone, one of the proposal's authors, said the bill sent out an important message.

"I think we came out on the side of student welfare and free speech because the hill is purely symbolic," Falcone said.

Senator Sajid Khan, also a co-author of the bill, said the non-binding resolution represents the senate's opinion and does not restrain free speech.

"I think as student senators we have the right to express our opinion, just as the Daily Cal has a right to express their opinion," he said.

Printed in the Daily Cal on Sept. 18, the political cartoon drawn by syndicated cartoonist Darrin Bell depicts two men with long beards dressed in robes and turbans in a large hand amid flames. A flight manual sits next to one of the men. Bell has said the cartoon depicts terrorist hijackers, not Muslims in general.

Khan, however, said there was a direct correlation between the cartoon and Arab-American students on campus being harassed.

Wajahat Ali, a member of the UC Berkeley Muslim Student Association, said he had to persuade some Muslim women to continue attending school despite the cartoon.

"Some sisters did not want to go to college [as a result of the cartoon]," he said. "We had to convince them to go."

Some senators, such as James Gallagher, spoke against the bill, saying it infringes on free speech.

"This is a free speech issue, and to look at it any other way would be really naïve," he said, as people in the senate gallery interrupted with comments like "you're stupid" and "shut up."

Gallagher said the bill would restrict the independent student newspaper's right to print all forms of speech and might lead to long-term negative effects.

"It might come back to bite you in the ass," he said.

Another way to protest the Daily Cal is to stop reading it, Senator Puja Sarna said.

The ASUC bill that passed does not include a recommendation to raise the Daily Cal's rent. That recommendation was dropped in senate committee Monday.

Daily Cal Editor in Chief Janny Hu said ASUC's decision will not affect the editors' decision not to apologize for the cartoon.

Reno visits University of Iowa

By Peter Boylan
The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

(U-WIRE) IOWA CITY, Iowa – Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno said Thursday the government needs to be careful to protect American civil liberties while war hysteria consumes the country.

"I think America must take care to protect our citizens' civil liberties while taking steps to secure the safety of our nation," she said.

Reno was at the University of Iowa as part of the Richard S. Levitt Distinguished Lecture series. She met with law-school faculty members and students prior to the lecture for an hour-long question-and-answer session.

"I have never had such an open, frank forum as I did with your student body," she said, suddenly breaking into a smile. "And your faculty as well."

Reno spoke to a group of nearly 400. Her lecture, "The Legal Profession as Problem Solvers and Peacemakers," focused on education, Internet law and the necessity to care for America's children.

"Let's make this time the time of education in America," she said. "We have got to recognize that learning and education is the lifeblood of democracy."

Reno said the nation has "failed America's children." She urged parents to take active roles their children's lives.

She said her own parents, especially her mother, should serve as an example to how others should care for their children. More specifically, parents should instill principles of reward and punishment, and fathers need to have a greater influence on children, she said.

"We can do so much if we put child and father back together," Reno said. "There is nothing more rewarding than taking care of the people you love."

Many who attended the lecture left feeling inspired.

"She was very passionate," said Lorelle Lindo, a first-year law student. "After 40 years of practicing law, she still knows what she wants to do."

Rwanda

The Rwandan Government ended the trial against 17 people for genocide in the province of Gikongoro. Five were given the death sentence for genocide and crimes against humanity, seven were given life in prison and three were given a seven-year sentence. Two were acquitted.

The government is trying to push the issue of justice for the genocide suspects. They consider confessions for the crimes an important step in healing the harm caused by the genocides. There are more than 3,000 suspects who were tried, but there are still more than 100,000 who are awaiting trial. The government sentenced 500 of these suspects. One of the 17 suspects confessed, reducing his sentence from 12 to seven years. Another problem in finding justice added to the circumstance is death of the many of the country's judges from genocide.

The Rwandan authorities will implement a new system for justice called "Gacaca courts." This is where judges who have positions in the community level will be given summary training. The suspects will then face the people of the villages who will either condemn or acquit them.

Argentina

After more than three years of recession, President Fernando de la Rua faces a challenge at the polls for the congressional elections. Fernando, who led a leftist party, has seen many failures in the economy.

Pollsters predict Fernando will do badly at the polls. They think that 10 to 40 percent will cast blank ballot papers in objection to all political parties. The country has a $132 billion debt that has made international investors apprehensive. They are faced with the possibility of bankruptcy.

The opposing Peronist Party is unpopular as well since its last president, Carlos Menem, was voted out two years ago, but is predicted to win seats. Menem is presently under house arrest because of charges of corruption.

Indonesia

Concerns over civilian casualties has caused Vice President Hamzah Haz to call for a halt to the American-led air strikes in Afghanistan.

"I urge the United States to stop the attacks... If they don't, there will be more civilian casualties," Haz said, who was quoted by the state news agency Antara.

He claimed there wasn't enough evidence indicative of Osama bin Laden's involvement in the suicide attacks. President Megawati Sukarnoputri thinks otherwise and supports America's military action. The president doesn't disapprove of the attacks in Afghanistan.

"We will continue to cooperate with the international community in handling this problem," she said.

Members of a radical Muslim community who said they would target Westerners recently attacked two German tourists who were mistaken for Americans. Another situation against foreigners occurred where protestors attacked a group of tourists in a van.

Radical Muslim group Islamic Defenders Front (FPI) stated they would try to rid Indonesia of all Americans and British people when the government failed to cut ties with the United States' following the attacks on Afghanistan. They said they would target places where a lot of foreigners dwelled, such as hotels and residential areas. Correspondents said most Muslims are not involved in the protests.

Kuwait

Abu Ghaith, spokesman for Osama bin Laden's Al-Qaeda network, has lost his citizenship in Kuwait. He was found to be a close aide to Bin Laden.

"In the national interest and according to Article 14 if the 1959 nationality law, the council (of ministers) has approved a proposed decree to withdraw Sulaiman Abu Ghaith's nationality," said Kuwait's cabinet.

Authorities detained Ghaith's brother, Mohammad Abu Ghaith, 34, because he had power of attorney to handle his brother's finances in the past. Reuters news agency said that Ghaith became famous in Kuwait preaching sermons during the Iraqi occupation. His sermons, which were banned, spoke against the government, the constitution, and other Arab states. Ghaith, who was an Arab fighter in Afghanistan, was given citizenship by the Taliban. Kuwait supports military actions against Bin Laden and the Taliban who are hiding in Afghanistan.

Ghaith made a tape where he warned Muslims not to travel by plane or live in skyscrapers in the U.S. or U.K., which alluded to the Sept. 11 attacks. He also made threats against U.S. President Bush, U.K. Prime Minister Tony Blair and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. He told non-Muslims to leave the Arabian Peninsula.

"The storm will not calm, especially the aircraft storm," Ghaith said.

said. "Therefore, we need to make that oasis a stronghold by becoming good at defending our beliefs."

Clarkson, who has monitored the Religious Right for the past 20 years, said the Alliance for Marriage, an organization promoting heterosexual marriage, plans to trump the volatility of state governments by presenting the federal government with a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriages. The Massachusetts Family Institute, who Clarkson said works in coordination with the organization, introduced DOMA to Massachusetts. The conservative movement, which "consists of small groups with much in common working together to achieve a broad, long-term agenda," can provide an effective model for the often-divided political left, Clarkson said.

Jonathan Lee, the Executive Director of Maine Speaks Out, described the difficulties his organization has faced promoting civil rights for GLBT communities over the past several years.

The Maine Speaks Out project trains GLBT volunteers to speak about their personal experiences and receive questions about their lifestyle, Lee said. "People were not used to seeing real live gay people in their towns."

According to Lee, Maine Speaks Out acquires access to many groups, such as workplaces, schools and clubs that would reject ideologies by avoiding political debate. Instead, the organization engages in activities "helping to change climate in a proactive way."

Lee read from a letter he wrote to Maine Governor Angus King Jr. following last year's defeat of the "Yes on Six" campaign to prevent sexual preference discrimination at Maine workplaces.

"We tried to coerce the people of Maine to vote yes on six, but they seemed surprised that this discrimination was present," Lee said.

Students across the nation struggle with the realities of war

By Joshua Wilson
The DePaulia (DePaul U.)

(U-WIRE) CHICAGO - Signs bearing slogans such as "Stop the War! No more Killing!!," "Down with U.S. Imperialism" and "No racist attacks, defend civil liberties" adorned Chicago's Federal Plaza this week.

Approximately 800 people, including 15 to 20 DePaul students, protested against the United States' commencement of attacks on Afghanistan at the Federal Plaza, Dearborn and Adams on Tuesday.

"I don't support the war in any way," said Kristin Robinson, sophomore undeclared major. "I don't think the people of Afghanistan are to blame for what happened in New York City."

The rally, organized by the Chicago Coalition Against War and Racism, began with singing through a microphone hooked up to a small loud-speaker. Plagued with feedback, verses of song encouraging peace, not war, echoed through the plaza while those in the audience sang along.

"Soon and very soon we are going to change this world, remember all the victims we are going to change this world," said one song.

The rally officially began with a moment of silence to commemorate those lost in the attacks in New York, Pennsylvania and Washington, D.C. However, the protestors uniformly highlighted that "the war did not begin on Sept. 11."

Students seemed to play a critical role in this protest. Midway through, after speeches from members of the American Friends Committee, the Eighth Day Center for Justice and United Muslims Moving Ahead, students were introduced from Harold Washington Community College, University of Illinois at Chicago and DePaul University.

Each student rose to the makeshift stage and voiced their opposition to the war and their encouragement for peace. When John Plamondon, a senior political science major at DePaul, was announced, a group of cheers arose from DePaul students attending the rally.

The main message from Plamondon and his fellow DePaul classmates was education.

"Educate yourselves, ask questions," said Christin Denning, a sophomore women's studies major. "This directly affects us too, not just the rest of the world."

"Look at other media sources," suggested Michael Ludden, a junior undeclared major. "The media can only go on what the government gives them."

And what the government has given the media at this point is not much, according to many protestors.

"Every fact that people learn about the policies of this government, the more convinced they will become that almost everything it says are lies and almost everything it does is evil," said Ken Burak, graduate student of philosophy at DePaul.

"I don't believe in an eye for an eye ideology," said Plamondon. "I do believe in bringing those who did this to justice. We must use diplomacy instead of a military response."

Aside from the anti-war sentiments expressed at the rally, the need to end racist attacks against Muslims and Arab Americans was also emphasized.

Several student organizations at DePaul have already began to form a new organization, People Emphasizing Action Community and Education (P.E.A.C.E.), which will allow students to come together to discuss social, political and economic issues, according to Plamondon.

P.E.A.C.E. is not an anti-war group, according to Plamondon. However, "we do promote peace throughout the world."

"It's about organizing, getting together and talking about these issues," said Plamondon. "We want to form a program that will educate the student body at DePaul about U.S. foreign policy and the United States' involvement all over the world."

"We must analyze our foreign policy and look for ways to benefit everyone economically, not just the United States," Plamondon said.

The Maroon (Loyola U. - New Orleans)

(U-WIRE) NEW ORLEANS – Thirteen people from Loyola University-New Orleans went to Washington, D.C., to represent Louisiana during a weekend of protests, carrying signs that read "Stop the USA, Stop the Monster" and "Louisiana says no to war."

Students who participated in the protests showed live video coverage of the event at a meeting on campus last Friday. Thirty-two people attended the meeting.

"The people who went to the demonstration were courageous. It's easier to fall into the masses, into an inflamed mass of emotional people," said John Clark, professor at City College and faculty adviser to the Loyola Greens club.

According to The Washington Post, more than 7,000 people from around the world attended the protests.

Some held signs that read "Amerika get a clue, people around the world hate you!"

"Our government is run by terrorists. I consider that profoundly evil," Clark said.

Some students who went to the protest said they were uneasy about how it would turn out.

"I thought it would be pretty violent," said Kelly Stiles.

Students said, however, that the protests were mostly peaceful, though security was tight.

Tanks and armed guards carrying tear gas blocked exits during the protests, preventing any of the protestors from leaving the area.

The students at the meeting said people were forced to make their own bathrooms along the sides of the streets as they were locked in for hours.

The video showed protestors with gas masks breaking through the police amid cries of "Whose streets? Our streets!" and "F—— Taliban, f—— right here!" from people in the crowd.

E.P. Menon, a man who walked from New Delhi to Hiroshima during a three-year time period promoting peace, was at the protest meeting Oct. 5.

"The people that attended the protests in D.C. were all the same [young] age. That is a tremendous, positive achievement for a better civilization," Menon said.

Menon, who has visited Afghanistan, said he was sympathetic to Afghanistan's citizens who are suffering.

"I felt the people of Afghanistan, such poverty. I have never seen such poverty," Menon said.

Although Menon said he is against the recent attacks on Afghanistan and believes that it is not an answer to the problem, he supports U.S. efforts to help the Afghan people.

"Bush is good. He is trying to get relief food to the people," Menon said.

Various reactions about the United States government and how it is approaching the situation have been the center of controversy on campus.

Rosina Roibal, music education senior and Loyola Greens president, said she lowes her country, but questions why patriotism is so widespread across campus.

"People don't even know what they are being patriotic about. [The United States] is a huge monster destroying the earth, and the American flag represents the blood and suffering of people all around the world," Roibal said.

William Barnett, associate business professor, said that the American attack was justified.

"Having suffered the attack we did, we had no choice but to respond," he said.

When asked what he thought of the people who consider the government action a form of terrorism, Barnett said, "Those people are so out of touch with reality that they should be in a mental institution or are morally bankrupt."

The Maroon (Loyola U. New Orleans)

(U-WIRE) NEW ORLEANS – In the wake of continuing attacks on Afghanistan by the United States, the country remains relatively calm. At Loyola University-New Orleans, opinions vary as to whether the United States is doing the right thing.

"You have to get back at the people who did it," said Edward Renwick, associate professor of political science.

The U.S. military began dropping bombs near Kandahar, the ruling militia headquarters of the Taliban, on Sunday, Oct. 7.

Since the U.S. attacks began, both faculty and students have reacted to America's retaliation for the Sept. 11 attacks in New York City and their war. We don't want innocent casualties, but if this is what it takes, then this is what we have to do."

Others are concerned that the United States' retaliation efforts will prompt further terrorist attacks.

"I'm against it. More Afghan retaliation isn't being considered," Wilson said.

Roney agreed.

"Yes, [I'm worried] because it's very obvious that terrorists have been planning attacks for years," Roney said.

Renwick said he was unsure as to whether there would be more attacks on America.

"There's obviously gonna be a lot more security than we're used to in this country," Renwick said. "I certainly think they are trying to prepare for [another attack]."

Renwick said that overall, it appears that people have begun to adjust to the events of the last month, but remain alert.

"It seems the society is rebounding to some extent," he said. "But we're much more awake and much more on guard now than we were on Sept. 11."

Anthrax scare:
Are we too afraid?

What a frightening week we've had as a nation.

To go from a powerful giant, exerting its will on Afghanistan, to a nation that seemingly trembles before the possibility of anthrax. Perhaps the situation isn't quite so dire; perhaps it isn't quite so theatrical.

But it is a suddenly existing situation. It is something that we now think about, that we now see on our televisions and webcasts. What was once a strange ailment that affected cattle has suddenly become something to fear. We fear it because an American has died after being exposed to the disease. We fear it because others have been infected or exposed.

However, if anthrax has radically altered the lives of the individuals exposed in the immediate in Florida and in New York City, it will have a wider, and much longer, impact throughout the rest of the United States. People will change the ways that they live.

From a more general concern about mail – mail! – to a suddenly lackluster box office, apparently impacted the number of people who were afraid to go out this weekend, the United States would appear to standing on its heels. We have good reason to be afraid, but at what point does our own fear become too much? At what point have we gone too far in our sudden fear of our neighbors and now, the mail that comes each day?

The fact of the matter is this. We, as human beings, can get sick at anytime, anywhere. We can catch the flu from friends and pneumonia from neighbors and both have the potential to be deadly. Now, apparently, we can also include the possibility of catching anthrax from airmail. The question isn't about the relative danger of the situation but instead, how do we handle this?

We must continue to live our lives in the ways that we intend to.

To live our lives in a state of constant intimidation is to give our enemies at least a shade of what they would want. To change our existence to prevent against the possibility of a dangerous new element is to kowtow to others.

We cannot be a party to such behavior. We cannot drastically alter our own existence on the off chance that we might, at some point, get an infected letter from our enemies. To even write such a thing seems absurd and ridiculous. Six weeks ago, that sentence never would have been composed, not in the strangest newsroom at the strangest newspaper. But the situation being what it's been, we've had to suddenly adjust.

The real question it, how much adjustment is too much? Changing our lives because of possible calamity is a dangerous road to go down. Changing our lives because our enemies have threatened us? At what point is living like Howard Hughes too much of a change?

We take chances every day. We climb behind the wheel when we know people die driving. We get on planes despite knowing that they crash or can be crashed. We visit friends in the hospital knowing that we too might become ill. So we cannot change our behavior because individuals are making threats against us. Until the danger is more defined, until we better understand the situation that faces us, we cannot live our lives in fear. We cannot give our enemies that.

Under an SOM sky:
On how the rest of us are being used

KEN CAMPBELL

I was watching the steel structure of the School of Management addition being worked on yesterday, and I couldn't believe my eyes.

There, amid the hardhats and the foremen, was a crew of liberal arts majors, chained to a girder, working. Over them stood a large, fearsome looking man, whip in hand, who lashed out at them whenever they tried to slow down.

That's right – the SOM is using student slave labor to raise its ivory tower.

Not that way, you sicko.

The SOM is a plague; a horrendous cancer on this campus and it is growing. And it is using the pristine souls of liberal arts majors to do it.

I don't blame the professors. It is not their fault. They've been captured too. Suckered in by the University with pretty pictures of bright young faces, all of whom want to learn about economics, finance and management, these brilliant people – and a lot of them are brilliant – have no idea that they are just cogs in the massive conspiracy that is SOM.

SOM, in reality, is not a specific college, like humanities (see: humanities ...It's even got human in the title, it has to be good) and fine arts. It is an evil plot, one that permeates the University to the highest level, and serves only to create division and faction the student body.

And they do it very well. Unlike the Commonwealth College, the organizers of the SOM cult realized that students don't pay attention to what happens to academic buildings, only the ones that they live in. So it was easy for them to just plant a building on campus that would do nothing but churn out people that would become, in the words of Scott Adams, pointy-haired bosses.

Is it any wonder why people hate their bosses in corporate America? It's because their boss is that kid that used to live down the hall from them, the one who played computer games every night and went home every weekend, the one whose only friends were the other societal rejects he found floating around on the Internet. While you were out meeting new people and learning about the history of ancient Greece, he was busy getting reprogrammed into a lean, mean, bootlicking machine.

Contrarily, the SOM and the Commonwealth College are both led, by the hand or forked tail as the case may be, into the greatness that is postgraduate occupational success. SOM cultists are given numerous opportunities to get jobs. The ruling council of SOM elders (which by the way, is comprised of, in order of descending rank: Satan, Bill Gates, Whitey Bulger, Mr. Burns from The Simpsons and Screech from Saved by the Bell) does everything short of driving the SOM faithful to the place of employment.

> "And all you folk that are pre-SOM majors, here's a news flash. I found a file that says project "Organ Donor" with all your names in it. That's right, the SOM has no intention of letting you into the cloistered paradise that is Management. They're only keeping you around for spare parts."

And I'm sure its just coincidence that "SOM" is the basic unit of currency of Kyrgyzstan. I'm not sure I know where that is, but I bet you it's somewhere evil. I'm kidding; I know where Kyrgyzstan is. It's that country in Risk from which you can invade North America. But the simple fact that SOM means money in Kyrgyzstan-talk is evidence enough of conspiracy. How much money, all of it from "private" – read: drug cartels – sources goes into that mortar and brick monument to greed?

Answer: more than I can add up on my fingers.

How much money has been spent on our four-bazillion dollar deferred maintenance bill? None. So while Joe and Jane SOM study at golden desks and walk through hallways carved out of diamonds, the rest of us try and find new ways to make our candles stay lit while we huddle it trying to study and keep warm at the same time.

And all you folk that are pre-SOM majors, here's a news flash. I found a file that says project "Organ Donor" with all your names in it. That's right, the SOM has no intention of letting you into the cloistered paradise that is Management. They're only keeping you around for spare parts. Creating white collar clones is tough work, and whenever one of the SOM brothers and sisters pops a gasket, or in this case, an aorta, that's when you get a phone call telling you that the dean would like to speak to you.

If this column sounds a little bitter, it's because I am. I'm tired of watching Billy Bulger shine some freshman's shoes because he's an SOM major. Meanwhile, Billy's staff car is parked on me and Billy's driver, and Vice President Knuckles is telling me not to scream because the SOM kids are trying to study. I'm tired of getting stab wounds while sitting in decrepit auditoriums. I'm getting real tired of watching the University hand these arrogant prigs careers, while protecting them from any of the hazards of real life. I'm really going to enjoy graduation. I think History majors are being seated ...yeah, I think we're all going to be in Lederle. Meanwhile, the SOM cultists will be front and center, seated on Billy's lap, waiting as livery coated servants present them with platinum diplomas.

Be warned! The SOM is all-knowing, all-powerful and completely devoid of any moral center. And it will win. We can resist, dear friends, but like my poor liberal arts compatriots chained to that girder, we will become its servants. So listen to me, fellow liberal arts majors. Do yourself a favor. Insult the SOM now. Make fun of it and its weird ways while we can. Because the all-too-likely future is that while today we call them jagoffs, we may soon be calling them boss.

Return the forward:
Stop wasting my time

BRIAN LOHNES

I have never been a supporter of e-mail forwards. We all get them and they are, for the most part, completely ridiculous. When I was a freshman, every day I'd have a whole bunch of these things clogging my computer. The ones about friendship, cutesy poems about how college is such a big thing, but you can't forget the people who got you there.

Yet I moved through school I would get them about how Kentucky Fried Chicken can't call itself that anymore because it doesn't actually sell chicken. It (and I know this is what the thing said) sells poultry products made from freaks' lockers raised with no hormones, fed through an IV and other BS, but that's not the best part. Some people actually read these things and believe them, to the point of defending the damn place, even though there isn't one shred of evidence to support them. Kentucky Fried Chicken calls itself KFC now because it lost a lawsuit for the same rights to a restaurant that had been using the name before it.

And quite strange and angering are the parts about people with incurable illnesses. One in particular has to do with me about a girl who was only eight years old and had come down with cancer because her parents smoked in the house. I think this one was actually looking for monetary donations. It really doesn't even deserve the newsprint to talk about it.

Now these forwards have hit all-time new lows, and they are more ridiculous and moronic than ever. I am sure that all of you have gotten the now infamous "Wingdings" forward about the WTC attack. If you haven't, then you probably have no annoying friends who send you forwards, and for that you are lucky.

For those who have gotten it and believed it, you are idiots. There was no "Flight 33" involved in any of the attacks. There were no passengers that were killed on a Flight 33 anywhere in the US or around the world on September 11. If you believed this message you should be ashamed of yourself because you are uninformed and obviously too stupid to pay at least some attention to the worst event in American history.

> "If you want to live your life by what a mystic wrote 600 years ago, that's your business. It would be like the ghost of Miss Cleo directing the world from the grave."

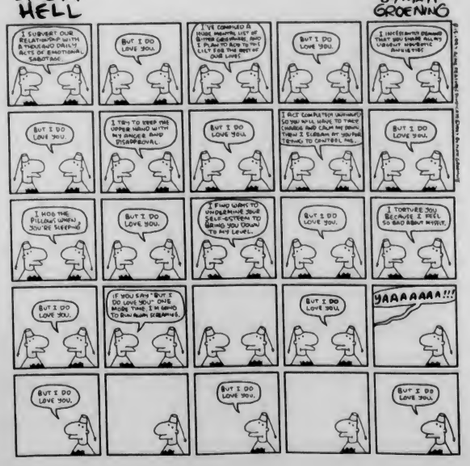
And just today, as I write this on October 12, there has been yet another incident of a forward causing more people more unnecessary stress. This one begins by saying that the writer's father is with FEMA and is working onsite at the WTC. First off, the fact that someone would be dumb enough to defile all of the heroic workers of FEMA, the NYPD and the NYFD by lying is revolting. It continues on to say that dozens of Ryder, U-Haul and Verizon trucks, and thousands of pounds of dynamite have been stolen nationwide, and that we should brace for more attacks. The letter finishes by saying that the writer's father told them it was ok to let this info out because it might save lives and that you should send this post to the people you love because it might save them.

Give me a damn break. So I get the post, what do I do when I see a UHAUL truck? Wet my pants and run in fear? Or do I drag the guy driving the truck out and make him open the back so I can look in and see all of the furniture he is moving to his new house? If you send these things along and perpetuate the spread of fear and paranoia amongst people you consider your friends, you are an ass.

Take five seconds and actually think about something before you do it. Hmmm, is it possible that this message is a load of bull? Ah, it's probably accurate and I'll just send it off to my friends who are probably worried about stuff anyway. If I could find the people who wrote these things, I'd have a field day.

On the positive side, however are the many, many incredibly witty, inventive and uplifting pictures supporting our country floating on the Internet. A personal favorite shows a B-52 bomber with its full array of armament organized and laid out in front of it. Above the picture of the plane is written, "The Terrorists have won the coin toss and elected to receive." Everyone has seen one of these and they are okay in my book because they are light and bring a smile to my face when I see them. They do not try to perpetuate fear in anyone and take advantage of an already fragile situation. I can only imagine what is being sent around now about anthrax.



Finally, Nostradamus. If you want to live your life by what a mystic wrote 600 years ago, that's your business. It would be like the ghost of Miss Cleo directing the world from the grave. Please, please stop sending me the post about the "twin brothers" falling. If I smoked enough opium, ate enough peyote, and drank too much hard stuff, I could begin spurting out ambiguous nonsensical things that could be construed by college students as the be all, end all word of the future. If you believe in Ouija boards, palm readings, crystal balls, and lack the mental ability to form your own thoughts about what is happening in the world, Nostradamus is the guy for you.

So for the good of everyone in your e-mail address book, stop sending us all crap. We have enough to worry about as we have been told that the FBI has begun requesting our records from Whitmore, or did you skip over that e-mail? That's something you should read, and read again.

But I guess if it doesn't say fwd: it's not worth reading.

Bandits is a hopelessly romantic, caper flick

BANDITS
Starring Bruce Willis, Billy Bob Thornton, and Cate Blanchett
Directed by Barry Levinson
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Let me use this review to declare my undying love for Cate Blanchett. You rock! Bandits is a half-ass movie before you burst onto the scene, as bright as your burning red locks, and invigorate the entire show.

Alternate intro: For a movie called Bandits, it's surprising that the most mundane and uninteresting portions of it (until the final scene) are actual bank robberies. Moviegoers have been down this road before, a team (in this case two) of quirky banditos effortlessly rob some banks, burp up some endearing one-liners, and rarely kill anyone the audience cares about. Along the way, a bored, usually young, always sexy woman latches on to the adventurers as an escape from her blah life. Suspicion, intrigue, and love triangles abound, adding all the necessary Hollywood ingredients so they can get this hot script into production, stat.

Bandits follows such same paint-by-numbers approach until Blanchett's character takes the wheel and mercifully drives it down a much more satisfying path. Joe (Bruce Willis) and Terry (Billy Bob Thornton) are the perfect odd couple: Joe calm and cool to Terry's neurotic hypersensitivity. Joe is the one that hijacks a cement truck to bust the two out of jail; Terry is the one that says a trip to Mexico presents a "sanitation issue." Free from jail and squatting in a house being squatted in by two horny teenagers, Joe and Terry devise the plan that will be their trademark, namely robbing banks by kidnapping the manager the night before and having him/her escort them to the bank the next day.

It's a marginally interesting premise; but after just seeing a preview of Stephen Soderbergh's upcoming Ocean's Eleven, a film about the robbers of three Las Vegas casinos, it seems a little modest. But hey, a small-time buddy thief film does leave plenty of room for character development except that after a short period with Willis' humorless attitude and Terry's blabbermouth antics the film really is in dire need of some inspiration. After meeting Joe's annoying stuntman 'brother' and sitting through a couple of unexciting heists, I was pretty much praying for a miracle to make this flick worthwhile.

And so she appears. We first see Kate (Cate Blanchett) roaring through a karaoake rendition of Bonnie Tyler's "Total Eclipse of the Heart" in the kitchen, into a mixing spoon and then a detachable sink head. She's got a lust for life, and its not being quenched by her husband, who turns down a dinner she made to go to the gym, telling her on his way out to "go see a movie." Blanchett falls neatly into the trite 'housewife swept away by the high-speed livin' of bandits' role that's

Star succedes for young and old alike

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The makers of Oliver Button is a STAR!, a documentary about children and gender roles, are to be commended. They have managed to produce an educational film that is informative without being preachy, and is at once suitable for both children and adults.

Oliver Button is a STAR!, which was broadcast Friday night in Mahar Auditorium, is based on Oliver Button is a Sissy, a children's book about an effeminate young boy who struggles to find acceptance. The film chronicles that book's plot by showing scenes of Northampton schoolteacher Mary Cowhey reading the book to her first grade class, and clips of the Twin Cities Gay Men's Chorus' performance of a musical based on the story. Animated sequences based on scenes from the book are also included.

But Oliver Button is no mere adaptation. It serves as a documentary about stereotypes, and features interviews with the book's author, Tomie dePaola, who partially based the character of Oliver Button on himself. Additional narration is featured from Arctic explorer Ann Bancroft, dancer Bill T. Jones, and makeup artist Kevyn Aucoin, three notable adults who refused, as children, to conform to traditional gender roles. Also thrown into the mix are scenes from the interview subjects' old home movies, newsreel footage, and 1950s-era commercials.

This may sound confusing, but the varied elements are woven together seamlessly. Oliver Button is a STAR! is an ambitious and ultimately successful experiment, the kind that could never be replicated. It's surprising that such an odd project was ever green-lighted, but the decision to fund it was a good one.

The overall theme of the film is society's inability to accept difference, especially in regard to gender issues. Interestingly, although the theme of homosexuality is always visible just below the surface, gay issues are never mentioned, apart from a brief scene in which make-up artist Aucoin describes how other boys called him a "faggot." This decision seemed to rankle some members of the assembled audience, but is ultimately a wise one. The interviewers describe their experiences in pre-pubescent years, in which they were presumably unaware of their sexuality. Also, presenting Oliver or the narrators as gay could give young viewers the impression that no effeminate men or masculine women are heterosexual.

The show is not, however, without its faults. The concept of showing clips from the interview subjects' home movies grows tired quickly, how many times can we be amused by footage of a little Tomie dePaola running around in a dress? The old commercials serve no real purpose, other than amusing the few people in the audience old enough to recognize them. And the lyrics of the Twin Cities Gay Men's Chorus' production of Oliver Button is a Sissy are often nothing short of appalling. ("Everyone thinks it's important to win/ That's how I know that I'll never fit in!/ Why can't I just be – me-e-e-e-e?")

But these are minor concerns. Oliver Button is a STAR! is that rare program that both children and their parents will find enjoyable. Rather than condescendingly lecturing its audience, it shows the impact that intolerant attitudes can have on children's lives, an approach that ultimately gives it far more impact than a simple afterschool special on bullying. In today's world of school shootings and rampant hate crimes, Oliver Button's lesson is not one we can afford to ignore.

Wooten brings bass to spotlight

VICTOR WOOTEN
Live in America

COURTESY COMPASS RECORDS
Flecktone Victor Wooten's new album proves a successful collaboration.

The best bass guitar player alive today has released a new live album. For those poor souls who have never heard of Victor Wooten, he is the superb standout bassist from the jazz-bluegrass group Bela Fleck and the Flecktones. With his brother, who calls himself Future Man, on various drum machines, Jeff Coffin on sax and renowned banjo master Bela Fleck, the Flecktones combine to create a very unique diverse sound that can only be described as talented.

While not touring with the Flecktones, Victor Wooten goes back to his roots to perform with his supremely musical family. Growing up in a military family, the youngest of five brothers, Victor was taught early the values and skills of music. At the early age of only three he was learning how to play bass from his oldest brother Regi. Victor made his first professional debut at five performing as part of The Wooten Brothers Band. Since that first performance, Victor as flourished as a musician as his new double CD Live in America is his first live release after three previous studio releases including the Grammy nominated Yin Yang and Show of Hands.

Having won his unprecedented third Bass Player of the Year award from Bass Player Magazine, Wooten is the most heralded and jaw-dropping bassist of this generation. With his trailblazing technique, Victor brings the bass guitar to the front of the stage as a solo and lead instrument rather than its traditional position in the back with the drum kit to make up conventional rhythm sections. On this CD especially you can hear this effect as Victor takes center stage with his masterful abilities, joined onstage by his two brothers, Regi on guitar and Joseph on keyboards, as well as drummer JD Blair, this CD demonstrates the comfortable level that these musicians hold with each other. Having been performing together for over twenty-five years, the brothers are adept at being able to tell what each other is going to play even before they play.

Having seen the local Northampton stop on the tour this album was cut from, I can honestly say that I was thoroughly impressed as well as entertained by there performance. Starting the show with a pre-recorded band introduction by Bootsy Collins, this album cuts through genre types and musical styles throughout.

From the funky opening number "What Did He Say" to the soulful and melodic "Hero" to the hard rock cover of Ozzy Osbourne's classic "Iron Man," this CD truly has something for everyone. With the addition of some special guests, this album really takes off. Adding her virtuostic bass and smooth rap to a number of songs, MC Divinity is beginning to make a name for herself. On the first track on the second disc "Miller Time" fellow bass wizard Marcus Miller adds his own touches, making for some very exciting interplay with Wooten and himself. This is a clear example of how the bass guitar can be used both as a soloing instrument as well as for laying down the groove behind the melody.

This album is simply a collaboration of many great musicians. It brings together a very diverse blend of music, while continuing to entertain the crowd. While the listener is guaranteed to enjoy his experience, this is one band where all members are just having a great time and it resonates through into their music.

Hollywood blamed the renewed threat of terrorism and anthrax for a slow box-office weekend. Moviegoers blamed the renewed barrage of caustically unfunny comedies and bland action films for their non-attendance.

Denzel Washington's Training Day held the top spot for a second week in a row, earning $15.6 million. Washington's first turn as a bad guy apparently held appeal for viewers who couldn't possibly be attending to see Ethan Hawke.

It was followed by outrageous buddy-caper Bandits, a film starring Bruce Willis, Billy Bob Thornton and Cate Blanchett. It earned $13.5 million, which is far less than its distributor, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Inc. expected. Considering that the movie cost, inexplicably, $75 million to make, Bandits will likely bomb financially. Reviews were mixed for the film that, by most accounts, had been made nearly 100,000 times before.

The only other new releases were Corky Romano, which is better left undiscussed, and Iron Monkey, which featured Quentin Tarantino's continued attempts to remind people that he is, in fact, still alive. Romano came in third place and made $9.5 million, just short of its $11 million budget. It is expected that the Chris Kattan vehicle will be profitable, thus increasing the threat that Kattan may appear in other movies. Monkey came in sixth place and made $6 million. The Hong Kong action film was released with the help of Tarantino. An aficionado of Hong Kong cinema, Tarantino's work to get Monkey released was described by some as a "labor of love," others as a "desperate attempt to stay in the limelight at least long enough for his newest movie, Kill Bill, to be theatrically released." Monkey is considered a classic of Asian cinema, a movie that first popularized some of the action sequences later seen in movies like The Matrix and Crouching Tiger/Hidden Dragon.

The only other movie that made much of a dent on the Hollywood consciousness was David Lynch's Mulholland Drive, a noir-thriller that packed the 66 theaters it was shown in. It made $708,000, averaging more than double per screening of its closest rival.

Rounding out the top five, Serendipity, with John Cusack and Kate Beckinsale, made $9.0 million, and Don't Say a Word, with Michael Douglas and his aging career, made $6.8 million.

Bringing up the rear were Zoolander, starring Ben Stiller and Owen Wilson (and Stiller's wife, Christine Taylor, who starred as Melody on Hey Dude), Joy Ride, starring the cute but relatively talentless Leelee Sobieski, Max Keeble's Big Move, starring the loveable antics of little Alex Linz, and Hearts in Atlantis, starring Hannibal the Cannibal, Anthony Hopkins. All four made a combined $16.4 million.

There have been some who suggested that next weekend might be better for Hollywood. But with Johnny Depp's From Hell, Robert Redford's The Last Castle, and Drew Barrymore's Riding in Cars With Boys (the sequel to Never Been Kissed, The Wedding Singer, and Home Fries, all of which were, like Riding will be, insufferable), there's absolutely no guarantee than an an audience apparently frightened by world events will be encouraged to possibly be frightened by Hollywood's productions.

■ bandits

made the rounds too many times, but the film's wise not to dwell on that hackneyed development. Instead, Bandits becomes essentially a full-blown love story, and a good one. Kate falls in love with both Joe and Terry, and the feeling is more than mutual. The competition between the two bandits that results is far more interesting than any of their bank robbery bloopers, save the excellent final job, expertly foreshadowed at the beginning of the film for added effect.

In the end, Bandits is a meditation on love, the central theme that the ambiguous previews for the film can't seem to convey. Emotional scenes between the three characters take place in areas with heightened atmospherics like an oceanside cliff and a sparse, dark bar during the middle of the night, suggesting the makers of the film know they're on to something much more than just your average criminal caper.

"The best part about that is that we are putting into practice during games what we train at, and there is not a better feeling for a coach," Rudy said of his squad and the way they have bought into his attacking system.

Machamer finished off the hat trick in the 62nd minute when she took a feed from freshman Carly Turman and fired a shot into the right side netting for a 5-0 lead.

With Machamer, Bartlett and company providing more than enough offense, neither of the UMass keepers was put under too much pressure. Senior Julie Podhrasky was called on to make just two saves Friday against the Bonnies while sophomore understudy Kelly Nigh also made just a pair of saves against Duquesne for her second shutout of the season. The Minutewomen have now recorded three consecutive shutouts and have not allowed a goal in more than 330 minutes.

The Minutewomen will look to get another pair of similar performances when they return to action this weekend against St. Joseph's and Temple in Philadelphia. UMass will be looking to maintain its perfect league record and remain in the pole position for its first A-10 regular season title since 1996.

Two different halves; two different teams

It was the best of times, it was the worst of times.

Corny, maybe. Indicative, absolutely. The best of times was a 17-6 halftime lead for the Minutemen. The worst of times was a late game, 10- play, 64-yard touchdown drive that locked up a 35-24 New Hampshire win.

Bill Knight trophy (MVP of the Annual UMass-UNH game) winner Stephan Lewis (25 rushes, 258 yards, 3 TD's) ran two yards to pay dirt marking the fifth straight second half collapse for UMass this season, but this time it was on homecoming.

MATTHEW E. SACCO

"[Lewis] is just a good player," linebacker Jeremy Cain said. "He started making plays and we have to tackle him."

Early on it seemed that the raucous Maroon and White crowd of 10,117 had awakened a slumbering offense, as the Minutemen jumped out to a 17-point lead. But an eleven-point halftime advantage was soon negated by the haunting theme of a second half breakdown.

A once strangling UMass defense (UNH: 187 first half yards) turned porous faster than a paper towel in water. The Wildcats rang up 289 yards and 31 points during a 30-minute mental lapse that again victimized the Minutemen.

The Minutemen (0-5, 0-3 Atlantic 10) have been outscored 101-7 in second halves of games this year. In fact, if UMass's season total (67 points) is juxtaposed with its tragic second half statistic, than the difference is still glaring.

The collective finger could be pointed at numerous different causes for this recurring post-halftime show slip. But the most feasible rationale for the collapsible UMass football team is youth or inexperience.

Of the 22 projected starters on the preseason depth chart, nine were underclassmen. The defense features a total of six starters and eight backups who are sophomores or freshmen – not exactly a recipe for success.

Game experience – a luxury UMass does not have – is an irreplaceable asset, especially when trying to finish games or protect leads. The Minutemen have only had a halftime lead once all year, the 17-6 advantage they squandered on Saturday. As far as finishing games well, UMass has not accomplished that goal either.

The Maroon and White were tied with William & Mary, 10-10, going into the locker room at the season opener. But the Tribe exploded out of the gates with two unanswered touchdowns in the third quarter.

In UMass' second contest against Division I-A Marshall, the Minutemen staked a late second frame comeback to bring the score to 28-20. But MU reeled off 21 unanswered points to turn a squeaker into a blowout.

In the second half against UNH on Saturday, the home team's tragic flaw was missed opportunities. Midway through the third quarter, with UMass still leading, wide receiver Jimmie Howard (1 TD catch, 60 yards) wheeled past his mark and dropped a sure touchdown pass along the left sideline.

Then at the beginning of the fourth quarter, on third and 16 from the UNH 21 yard line, QB Matt Guice rolled and found Neal Brown in the corner of the endzone – drop.

"Twenty-four [points] should've been forty [points]," Whipple said. "That cost us the game."

Second half butterfingers and mental miscues blemished what was a near perfect first 30 minutes of football for the Maroon and White. If the Minutemen are to hang up a "W" this season, than they better figure out that walking away with a win requires showing up for the second half.

and fellow junior Jimmy Callahan up front, senior Martin Miljko and captain Toni Söderholm at the point, with Pöck floating between the front and the back, leaving three men up top or three down low.

"We either try to circle with Jimmy Callahan and me, or we try to find Marty Miljko up top for the one-timer," Pöck said.

"I'd like to see [Miljko] be able to deliver the puck to the net a little bit more," Cahoon said. "Martin's [in the left slot] because he shoots the puck like a pro. We need to be able to get more shots on net – we need to be able to get him to deliver the puck like he can."

Likewise, UMass turned in an impressive performance on the penalty kill, shutting down the Purple Eagles' man advantage for the majority of the night, minimizing the number of shots that found their way to senior goaltender Mike Johnson.

"I didn't see many shots when they were on the power play – that's the name of the game," Johnson said. "When they can't get the puck to the net, jam and drive for rebounds the penalty killing is at its best. I can't say enough about the defensemen getting back to the puck when [Niagara] initially dumped it in. Attacking the puck right away, getting it out – Niagara didn't even have a chance to set up for most of their time on the power play."

It may be the first step in a long journey for the youth-laden UMass Minutemen, but the improvement of the special teams on Saturday was certainly an important one.

In an unfortunate turn of events, Niagara's starting goaltender Ryan McNeil hit his bare skull on the net's post in the third period.

Wildcats claw back; hand UMass fifth straight loss

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

UMass	35
UNH	24

Leading 17-0 with one second left in the second quarter of Saturday's bout with New Hampshire, the Massachusetts football team seemed to have finally put together a solid half of football.

But that notion weakened with no time remaining when New Hampshire's Stephan Lewis came up with freshman Mike Graniero's 49-yard Hail Mary toss in the right portion of the end zone to cut UMass' lead to 17-6.

Behind that jolting tally, Lewis and the Wildcats outscored the Minutemen by 22 points in the next 30 minutes to secure the 35-24 UNH victory and send UMass to its fifth consecutive defeat. The Maroon and White's 0-5 (0-3 Atlantic 10) start is unprecedented in the program's history.

Lewis headed the Minuteman second half dismantling with three unanswered fourth-quarter touchdowns to wipe away the 24-14 advantage UMass held with just over 13 minutes left in that stanza.

The junior, named the game's Most Valuable Player, carried the ball five times for 258 yards and added four catches for 94 yards to help up New Hampshire's record to 4-2 (2-2 A-10).

The Wildcats led 28-24 with 3:34 left in the game when Aaron Thomas picked off UMass' Matt Guice for the second time of the afternoon. Guice, whose 63 attempts and 403 passing yards were both school records, was intercepted four times.

On that play, Guice rolled right and lofted a pass to Eddie Campbell that deflected off the senior's fingertips and into the outstretched arms of the diving Thomas.

And after the next snap, Lewis broke into the Minuteman backfield and scrambled 77 yards for the silencing score.

Just two minutes prior to that gain, Lewis capped a five-minute plus, 62-yard scoring drive with a six foot run to paydirt. With 4:39 left, Granieri hit senior Brian Mallette for 28 yards on third-and-10 to bring UNH to the UMass six-yard line and keep that drive alive.

Seven minutes earlier, Lewis scored the first of his three touchdowns after darting 36-yards down the right sideline to cut the Maroon and White lead to 24-21.

The Minutemen's only success in the latter half came early in the fourth quarter when Guice found junior Neal Brown on a corner route for the 21-yard touchdown grab. Brown led all receivers on the day, totaling 118 yards on nine receptions.

The only third quarter register came on an 11-yard Granieri throw to junior Michael Taylor. UMass had two realistic chances in the stanza, but failed to convert.

With 10:01 left in that quarter, Guice was picked off by freshman Brandon Taylor on New Hampshire's 19-yard line. Just under four minutes later, junior Jimmie Howard let a pass fall right through his hands in the left corner of the end zone.

Howard's miss wasn't the first drop of the day, however. Freshman Jason Peebler dropped a catch in Six Town at the end of UMass' first drive of the day, a series that resulted in a blocked field goal.

"The chances were there," Head Coach Mark Whipple said. "You can't drop the ball. You just can't drop touchdown passes."

Guice, who ran in UMass' first score of the day early in the opening quarter, delivered a 60-yard bullet to Howard with 8:21 left in the second quarter to give the Minutemen a 14-0 advantage.

The Cats' starting quarterback, Ryan Day, went down with a shoulder injury early in the second quarter. Granieri and junior Michael Taylor split the replacement duties.

Good for starters

By Matthew F. Sacco

The UMass hockey team is on its most prolific season starting winning streak in six years. One. But the first is certainly the toughest, especially when 10 of the 20 opening night roster spots are held by underclassmen.

UMass	4
Niagara	2

The Minutemen jumped on Niagara early with three first period goals that led to a 4-2 win. UMass played a strong game in all three zones, but as most of the players would contend, this team has a long way to go.

"We have to pick it up some if we want to beat teams like Boston University and Boston College," UMass forward Thomas Peck said. "But it's a good start for our team."

Tim Turner, last years leading scorer with 26 points, notched the game winner on the power play at 15:29 of the first period.

NU goalie Ryan McNeil made the initial obstructed view save on Peck's blistering point shot, but Turner collected the rebound and shelved it over the sprawling netminder.

McNeil, who left the game after hitting his unprotected skull on the post in the third, made 14 saves in the losing effort.

Turner's top corner tally sent the Minutemen into the first intermission with a commanding 3-1 lead.

Almost halfway through the first Scott Horvath, on a line with two freshman, gave UMass its second lead of the contest. Horvath made a solid defensive stand up at the opposing blue line, poking the puck free to rook Peter Trovato, who fed the puck right back to Horvath for a one-timer.

Less than two minutes before that, the Purple Eagle's Ryan Gale had silenced the disappointing crowd of 2,784 with the equalizer. Gale took an outlet pass from John Heffernan, out muscled defenseman Samuli Isllkainen, and beat UMass keeper Mike Johnson five-hole.

Johnson allowed only one other goal (20 saves) in lead protection mode. The senior Minnesotan looked strong in his first game as the team's official No. 1 starter. His experience was welcome and his poise was undoubtedly a product of playing with the lead.

"It is a great feeling [to play with the lead]," Johnson said. "There's a lot more pressure on you than if you are down a couple goals."

Peck didn't wait long (4:49 of the first) to open the flood gates on the power play. Isllkainen drew the penalty when Niagara forward Rob Bumbaco held him.

Senior captain Toni Soderholm quarterbacked the UMass PP, feeding Martin Miljko in the left slot who faked the one-timer and threaded a cross-ice feed to a cutting Peck for the goal.

With UMass leading 4-1 in the second, Bumbaco dug a rebound out of a goal-mouth scramble before stuffing it into the yawning net. That goal cut the deficit to two but that was as close as the Eagles would get against a sudden-ly stingy UMass defense.

Special teams star in opening night victory

So far, this team is special.

The Massachusetts hockey team had its fate decided by the special teams on Saturday night as the Minutemen went two-for-seven on the man advantage and killed off all five Niagara power plays en route to their 4-2 victory.

"[Special teams is] a big part of our team – that's a big part of any team," said junior forward Tim Turner, whose game winning goal came on the power play. "When you can get the special teams going, it makes five-on-five play that much easier. If you're scoring on your power play, that gives you momentum and it gives you confidence – it's huge."

"I thought in the power play situation, at least when we started off, we played with a lot of confidence and a lot of poise." Head Coach Don Cahoon said. "We got into some trappings as the game went on with the power play, but I saw some puck movement and I saw some people do the things that they should do in those situations. The special teams played a major role in the outcome of the game."

This was quite a change for the Maroon and White, as over the past few years, the team's major struggle has been special teams play. Last season, the power play connected at a dismal 15.2 percent rate and the penalty kill was a horrific 76.3 percent. Down the stretch, the Minutemen improved their shorthanded numbers over the final nine games, but the power play was barely a blip on the radar screen at one-for-32.

Saturday's play was an improvement over the team's only exhibition game as well, as in the contest against St. Francis Xavier, the Maroon and White allowed three goals on the man advantage in six tries, while netting only one power play goal on five attempts. Partially because of that performance, Cahoon and his staff set to working on the special teams last week in practice.

"What we've done is tried to delegate certain areas of the game throughout the coaching staff and that allows each coach to focus on specific drills – we work as a cooperative unit," Cahoon said following Saturday's victory. "That gives some attention to detail – whether it be looking at tape, or talking to the individuals in that grouping or the protocol of setting the practice schedule up. All that stuff that we hadn't gotten to was dealt with this past week and I think we got their attention as a result of it."

According to Cahoon, the Minutemen worked on every facet of the special teams, including "power play breakout, to setup in the zone, to puck movement, to personnel, to making sure we get puck possession off face-offs." Additionally, the Maroon and White drew up several plays to be worked on the power play off the faceoff.

"Coach Cahoon had a new system with us which we worked on last week and it worked pretty well," said sophomore forward Thomas Peck, who put home the team's first power play goal of the season in the first period. "We played pretty well together and we'll see if we can get that going."

The new system that Peck referred to featured Turner

Minutewomen net 12-goal weekend

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Offense wins games and defense wins championships. That's how the adage goes. But offense and defense together, that is the mark of a good team – something the Massachusetts women's soccer team proved it is this weekend.

The Minutewomen won a pair of games, knocking off St. Bonaventure 5-0 on Friday afternoon before disposing of Duquesne 7-0 yesterday. Senior midfielder Kat Machamer gave a five-star performance in both matches, tallying three assists against the Bonnies before netting her first career hat trick Sunday against Duquesne.

St. Bonaventure	0

Duquesne	0

"It was really exciting [to get the hat trick,] but I think it was more exciting to see how well the team played today," said Machamer following Sunday's win. "It was a total team effort and I think everybody played well."

"This system suits her system of play," said UMass coach Jim Rudy of his senior midfielder. "She plays like an older woman, she doesn't play like a kid."

The weekend did not get off to a great start for UMass (8-2, 5-0 Atlantic 10) as it lost starting midfielder Martha Conover less than three minutes into Friday's match. A clash of heads left Conover with a sizeable gash in the back of her head from which she did not return. However, the wound had healed enough by Sunday to allow her to play.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Stephanie Santos and Co. are on a roll.

One person who did not play on Sunday was sophomore striker Erin Lilly. Lilly, who had notched three assists on Friday, giving her eight on the season, partially dislocated her shoulder when she went down awkwardly during training on Saturday.

The unavailability of these two players gave some others off the UMass bench a chance to step up, a chance that was not passed up by junior Andrea Trujillo or sophomores Rainey Meisel and Janelle Khouri. All three came into the weekend without a point on the season but each played key roles in the two conference victories. The triumvirate combined for three goals and five assists in the two matches and their performances went miles to solidifying their role within the team.

"It's nice to know that the kids who are playing [off the bench] are doing real things, they're not just occupying space," said Rudy. "That's the good part about getting people on, giving them their opportunity and if you get the opportunity, you do something with it."

Trujillo scored her first-ever collegiate goal in the 81st minute against St. Bonaventure, and added an assist on Sunday on the Maroon and White's seventh and final goal against the Dukes, a tally by Meisel, her second in as many games. Meisel, a sophomore walk-on from Eugene, Ore., notched her first-ever point at UMass when she assisted on Trujillo's goal and then added her first goal less than five minutes later on Friday.

But the star of the bench was undoubtedly Khouri. After seeing little playing time for most of the early part of the season, Khouri filled in admirably for the injured Conover in the center of the UMass midfield against SBU and then came off the bench to contribute three assists against Duquesne on Sunday.

"When you get more time, then you can get into the game and start creating more," Khouri said.

"The key thing here is whether she is playing early or late she is giving some quality work," Rudy said. "Some of that stuff was just really good."

As well as these three played, they were still overshadowed by the play of Machamer. The senior, who netted her first goal of the season last weekend against Fordham, picked up three more to give her four on the season and eight for her career. She scored the game-winner just two and a half minutes into the game on Sunday when she side-footed a Brooke Bartlett cross past Duquesne goalie Kristin Scharphorn to give the Minutewomen a 1-0 lead.

Bartlett and Machamer hooked up again less than four minutes into the second half when Bartlett, who had a goal and three assists over the weekend, was again freed down the right flank by defender Alexi Rudd. Bartlett beat her defender to the end line and whipped in a cross, only for Scharphorn to palm it away, but only as far as Machamer who headed the rebound into the open night to make the score 3-0.

Bruce Campbell lectured at Mount Holyoke College yesterday.

Bruce Campbell draws army of fans to MHC

By Andrew Chin
Collegian Correspondent

Fans from all across Massachusetts gathered at Mt. Holyoke College this weekend to catch a glimpse of actor Bruce Campbell in action.

The event was held this past Sunday at the Chapin Auditorium and included a book/memorabilia signing after the presentation. Campbell, renowned B-movie actor of the cult movie classic Evil Dead was on hand to promote his new book If Chins Could Kill: Confessions of a B-Movie Actor. It was sponsored in part by the Mount Holyoke College Film Studies and the Odyssey Bookshop of the Village Commons, off College Street in South Hadley.

"No matter what I wrote, people will always be tortured," Campbell said during the presentation, making the light note that he has added writing to his already large repertoire as an actor.

A documentary film that focused on the Campbell fan base preceded the event. It gave the audience a different perspective of not only Campbell's fans but also fans of other sci-fi convention genre. Narrated by Campbell himself, the documentary shed some light on the little known facts of fan-ville.

"Why are people fans?" he asked in the film. "Why are they fans to the extent that they're going to spend forty weeks in making a costume that they will walk across the stage with in four seconds? That's fascinating."

Fans were put into the spotlight and ranged from the "mildly obsessive" to the "fanatical." Examples of the "fanatical" are acts such as altering names and having surgery done to look like their favorite actor/actress. According to Campbell, the extremely "fanatical" involves "lawsuits" and "police." He even hinted to the fact of being stalked by a couple of fans on more than one occasion.

Amherst panel debates War on Drugs

By Jake Ullen
Collegian Staff

Last year Andrew Epstein, a senior at Amherst College, conceived an original project for an art class. In order to make a statement about the futility of the war on drugs, he managed to ban the sale of coffee on the Amherst campus for twenty-four hours, and watched the pandemonium that ensued. His project made national news, including the front page of the New York Times.

Last night Epstein and Amherst College Students for a Sensible Drug Policy attempted to host a debate between two drug policy advocates – Deborah Small, public policy director for the pro-legalization Lindesmith Center, and Robert Housman, the former assistant director of the anti-legalization organization Strategic Planning – in order to foster discussion of drug policy issues on the Amherst campus.

Housman, however, was unable to attend, due to Congressional hearings on the September 11 attacks. In his absence, Small delivered a lecture last night in Converse Hall on the arguments for legalization, and led the audience in an open discussion.

Rather than argue that legalization could lead to greater public safety, a common argument of decriminalization advocates, Small focused on the argument that drug laws, in theory, violate human rights.

"All of the drugs you buy or take are things your body makes naturally," Small told the assembled audience. "Our body makes opiates, and stimulants, and things that make you sleep. Nothing you put into your body is foreign. Using drugs is a way of increasing the body's own ability to alter its consciousness."

"As long as human beings have been on this planet," she continued, "we have looked for ways to alter consciousness. There is no society that didn't have some ritual around the altering of consciousness. Some of it was attached to religious practice, some was erotic, and some was recreational. It's nothing new."

Small pointed out that medical author Dr. Andrew Weil has noted that young children often attempt to alter their consciousness.

"Children engage in behavior with similar effects to drugs," she said. "Holding their breath, running around in circles, holding their head below the water in the bathtub. For the most part it's a pleasant thing."

A great deal of Small's lecture dealt with what she perceives as hypocrisy on the part of the government in accepting some drugs but denouncing others.

"Some people would say that it's perfectly reasonable for a society to prefer coffee over cocaine," she said. "I would say, how? And why? And does that make any sense?"

She pointed out that Ritalin, a drug regularly given legally to schoolchildren, has many similar properties to cocaine.

At one point, she asked if anyone in the audience felt that marijuana, as a drug, was more harmful than caffeine or cigarettes.

"I don't know about all y'all," said Small, "but I tried marijuana, and I liked it. It didn't make me feel a whole lot different than drinking a couple of glasses of wine. But you can go to jail for that!

"I don't know how many people in this room smoke cigarettes," she continued. "When you talk about drugs with such a high level of addictiveness, I can not think of many others...but we as a society have built in regular fixing times for people – cigarette breaks, coffee breaks."

A crucial point of Small's argument was that drugs, even if dangerous, should be legal for those who wish to do them simply because it is not the business of the state to intrude in such matters.

"The goal of the war on drugs is to control people's personal behavior," she said repeatedly.

While Housman was not in attendance to present the anti-legalization argument, many audience members took Smalls to task on her views.

Particularly controversial was her assertion that pregnant women should not be punished for using drugs such as cocaine.

One audience member, who described her experiences babysitting for a child with fetal alcohol syndrome, accused Small of being more concerned with the rights of an expecting mother to use drugs than the right of a child to be "born healthy."

"If you're a pregnant woman who has a problem with obesity or an eating disorder, you can harm your child just as much (as if you used drugs)," she responded. "You can harm your child by taking in too much salt. Are we going to pass laws that mandate that people not do that?"

Anthrax scare puts nation's media outlets on increased alert

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The fear of exposure to the anthrax bacteria has heightened within the past 24 hours, with reports of two new cases of the infection contracted within media outlets around the country.

ABC studios confirmed yesterday that an infant who had visited the set of World News Tonight in late September had tested positive to cutaneous (skin based) anthrax. Although ABC is unsure as to whether or not the child contracted the illness while visiting the set, the network is still taking the necessary precautions and has tested employees working at the station. So far no one has tested positive, and the infant is expected to make a full recovery.

This is the third incident to affect media organizations in the United States, the first of which affected American Inc., a business located in Boca Raton, Florida. One individual there died from inhalation of the bacteria, while another is being treated for exposure.

Another letter that tested positive for anthrax was sent to Tom Brokaw at NBC. His assistant, who is now currently being treated for exposure to the bacteria, opened the envelope.

In an interview with Face the Nation on Sunday, U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft speculated on why this could be directed at the media.

"If I were a terrorist, I would want to engender fear that was irrational, and I would want to curtail the availability of information in a free press that was good information," he said.

Jessica Johnson, the president of University of Massachusetts television station UVC, explained that targeting the media is an efficient way of spreading the message.

"The media is the fastest way to get the public's attention," she said.

Max Shea, a community member and employee at student radio station WMUA made similar remarks.

"It is obvious that the media is what is used to send out messages," Shea said. "Sending letters to media outlets is a quick way to get the message out."

Shea went on to explain that the country as of yet was not sure whether or not the cases of anthrax were incidents of terrorism or simply hoaxes. Because of this

Cuts back in spotlight

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

Budget cuts will be take center stage when the Faculty Senate discusses issues facing the University of Massachusetts at its regular meeting on Thursday.

On the agenda this week is an address from Margo Crist, Director of the Libraries, concerning the Education and Reference Materials (ERM) budget cuts proposed during state budget negotiations this week in Boston.

In addition to concerns over library funding, the discussion will focus on the possible establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee on undergraduate education. Following these presentations will be the regular announcements and question period.

Proposed budget cuts for the state would cut the ERM budget by 20 percent, allowing the libraries to acquire fewer journals and resources for the students and faculty to use. The ERM budget, shared by 29 higher education libraries across the state, would be reduced from $14 to $11 million if the cuts are passed. It would be the first time since before 1999 that the budget has dropped to that level. UMass receives 30 percent of this budget and will therefore take 30 percent of the loss.

The Library Council sees the budget cuts as a threat, not only to the University and its resources, but also to the state's economy. The faculty wishes to avoid this cut, and the Senate has proposed a motion demanding that the budget cuts that would affect ERM monies be suspended.

"The Faculty Senate of the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, call upon the Governor and the House and Senate leadership to restore the current level of funding and thereby avoid devastating cuts to our libraries," reads the motion, which will be debated and voted on at the meeting.

The motion, sponsored by the Senate's Research Library Council, explained that these funds are important to the mission of the library.

"These vital funds are used to buy the books and subscribe to the journals that are essential to the successful education of our students," the motion reads. "And the outstanding research that contributes both to that education and to the economy of the Commonwealth."

After discussions on the ERM budget cuts conclude with questions, the Senate will turn to the proposition of establishing an Ad Hoc Committee for Undergraduate Education.

The proposed committee would be a three-year commitment with renewable terms, provided to assist the existing councils and committees of the Faculty Senate. In addition, the committee would provide a forum for the broader issues of undergraduate education, while

National Briefs

California

By Josh Wolf
Daily Bruin (U. California-Los Angeles)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES – As the United States works to decrease its vulnerabilities after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Senator Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., is asking the federal government for $52.5 million to reform the student visa program.

Feinstein, who recently dropped a proposal for a six month moratorium on student visas, is proposing that the Immigration and Naturalization Service conduct background checks on all foreign students applying for visas and that academic institutions update INS regularly on the academic and disciplinary records of foreign students.

Hani Hanjour, one of the suspects in the hijacking of American Airlines Flight 77 that crashed into the Pentagon, entered the United States on a student visa but never pursued his education.

Some educators oppose the proposal, saying the new security measures may deter foreign students from studying in the United States.

"Our concerns are the message it might send to international students," said Larry Gower, director of the Office of International Students and Scholars at the University of California-Los Angeles.

Currently, 4,800 foreign students study at UCLA. Gower said many of which come from countries the United States does not perceive as threats.

Concern about people on student visas is not new for Feinstein, who has been working to create an electronic database to keep track of foreign students since 1996 when such a system was mandated by the Immigration Reform and Responsibility Act.

The act stated that the INS had to compile a computer database to collect and verify information on foreign students by 2003, replacing its paper filing system which is slow and difficult to update.

"This has been a long-standing issue with Congress, the need has been crystallized by the Sept. 11 attacks," said Jim Hock, Feinstein's press secretary.

Some educators predict there is no quick fix to the problem of not being able to track people at student visas.

"A quick and perfect world would be very difficult to set up," Hanjour said.

Despite the pause, part of the Border Security Act that Congress passed in May requires that all countries on the updated information system used by the INS wants to clean the system up or comply with federal laws and prevent further unlawful entries through the student visa program, Hock said.

Feinstein decided to drop her proposed six-month moratorium after it proved unpopular with many students and educators. A letter from David Ward, the president of the American Council on Education, urged Feinstein to focus her efforts in a different direction.

INS statistics from 1999 show that about 547,000 people were in the United States on foreign student visas compared with 31 million people that entered the country using business or tourist visas.

Since students make up less than 2 percent of foreigners in the United States, according to Paul Hasson, assistant director of public affairs at ACI, "it is unfair to single out students when they represent such a small percentage."

In his letter, Ward stressed the willingness of academic institutions he represents to work toward improving the system for keeping track of individuals in the country on student visas.

With this pledge, Feinstein dropped the moratorium from her plan, and is now pushing for the computer database — known as the Student Exchange Visitor Information System — with the support of ACI.

"We have been in favor of the tracking system for a long time," Hassen said.

The new system would be Internet-based so the information could be easily updated.

Elaine Komis, a spokeswoman for INS headquarters, said that currently, information about students with visas is kept on paper by academic institutions and is available to the INS upon request.

"We've always required schools to provide us access to information. (The new system) will provide current information on students in the United States," Komis said.

But implementing SEVIS will be a difficult task, and the total cost might not be completely reflected in Feinstein's proposal.

According to Komis, the $52.5 million requested wouldn't cover the entire cost of implementing the new system. An additional $1.5 million is needed to obtain computer software and equipment for production processing at the Department of Justice, and $5 million is needed to reimburse U.S. Customs, State Departments and INS for building their portions of the infrastructure.

Feinstein has requested that Congress set aside the funds in the Emergency Supplemental Appropriations package.

Feinstein's camp isn't worried about finding the project.

"We pretty much have good support in Congress to give INS the resources they need," Hock said.

such a good job for the University of Alabama, and he's done a good job for the state," Stone said.

"It's a void we'll have to fill. Dr. Meredith really set the bar because he was willing to go beyond the norm by taking such strong positions."

Some of those positions have proved contentious, however. Meredith drew the ire of many UAB students and faculty last month when he asked the Board of Trustees to push for the resignation of UAB President Ann Reynolds. Reynolds will step down at the end of next summer.

Despite the recent controversy, Meredith has retained the support of many prominent state officials. Don Siegelman's press secretary, Carrie Kurlander said the governor appreciates Meredith's "invaluable contributions to education" and his work as vice chairman of the Alabama Commerce Commission.

"The governor feels Meredith has been a tremendous asset to Alabama," Kurlander said. "If he leaves, Georgia would be very lucky to have him."

In a statement, University President Andrew Sorensen expressed similar sentiments about Meredith's value to the state.

"Tom Meredith has provided excellent leadership for the University of Alabama System," Sorensen said. "His strong advocacy for fair funding of higher education in the state legislature has been beneficial not only to the UA System but to all of higher education in Alabama. If he leaves, I will be sorry to see him go."

Kellee Reinhart, director of UA System relations, said a move to Alabama's eastern neighbor would be the next logical career step for Meredith.

"The University System of Georgia system educates about 206,000 students and has a $4 billion budget. In addition, two of its member institutions, the University of Georgia and Georgia Tech, are ranked among the nation's top 15 public universities by "U.S. News and World Report."

Meredith has been chancellor of the UA System for almost five years. The system, which includes the universities in Tuscaloosa, Birmingham and Huntsville, includes 40,000 students, 17,000 employees and an annual $1.8 billion budget.

Gordon Stone, executive director of the Higher Education Partnership, a lobbying group for Alabama's four-year institutions, praised Meredith as a powerful supporter of postsecondary institutions statewide, especially during last year's lengthy proration battle.

The Crimson White (U. Alabama)

(U-WIRE) TUSCALOOSA, Ala. – State officials said Thursday they regret University of Alabama system chancellor Tom Meredith's potential departure from his post, but offered assurances that higher education in Alabama would not suffer as a result.

Meredith is under consideration for the head job at the University System of Georgia, according to a memo released Wednesday to the UA Board of Trustees.

"I have allowed my name to go forward in the search process and am honored to be considered for the chancellorship of the University of Georgia System," Meredith said in a recent statement.

If Meredith accepts the job, he will be in charge of 34 universities, including all technical, regional, research and state colleges. The Georgia system educates about 206,000 students and has a $4 billion budget. In addition, two of its member institutions, the University of Georgia and Georgia Tech, are ranked among the nation's top 15 public universities by "U.S. News and World Report."

Kellee Reinhart, director of UA System relations, said a move to Alabama's eastern neighbor would be the next logical career step for Meredith.

"The University System of Georgia is one of the top five systems of higher education in the United States," Reinhart said. "This job, if it is offered to Dr. Meredith, would be almost a natural progression for his career. To me, it all makes good sense."

The recent economic downturn means a second straight year of budget cuts looms over the heads of state educators. However, Stone said the state's history of proration was not the primary impetus behind Meredith's departure.

"I don't know if there's one particular circumstance in Alabama that motivated this," Stone said. "There are just some jobs that have a lot of characteristics that make them very attractive, and the Georgia job is one that fits that mold."

Meredith is one of three prospects to replace current Georgia Chancellor Stephen Portch, who stepped down in May to fulfill a promise not to serve more than seven years in the position.

Other candidates include William Gordon, president of the University of New Mexico, and Richard Jarvis, chancellor of United States Open University in Aurora, Col.

Alethia Perry-Johnson, spokeswoman for the University System of Georgia, said state law requires a two week deliberation period before a decision is made. Joe Frank Harris, vice chairman of the Georgia Board of Regents, said he hopes to select a new chancellor before the board's next regularly scheduled meeting on Nov. 14.

UA trustee Paul Bryant Jr. of Tuscaloosa said he did not know if Meredith has made a final decision on the matter.

"If he has an opportunity that he thinks would improve his current situation and he's excited about it, then I'm excited for him," Bryant said.

Trustee John England of Tuscaloosa said Meredith's leadership qualities make him an attractive candidate for the Georgia system.

"When you have a good person doing an outstanding job, other systems want him," England said. "It's just what happens. He's done a remarkable job of getting all the campuses in the system working toward one goal."

Many educators complimented Meredith's efforts to defend higher education interests in Montgomery.

"This (departure) comes at a particularly difficult time for us with the legislative challenges ahead of us," said Margaret Garner, an assistant professor in the College of Community Health Studies who worked with Meredith in lobbying for the universities.

State Rep. Tim Parker, R-Tuscaloosa, said Meredith set an impressive precedent for his successor.

"He's going to leave big shoes to fill," Parker said. "Georgia's gain is Alabama's loss."

Mississippi

By La Wanda Hicks
The Student Printz (U. Southern Mississippi)

(U-WIRE) HATTIESBURG, Miss. – Long-distance romantic relationships get mixed reviews among college students in Mississippi.

A long-distance romantic relationship involves being committed to each other emotionally and sometimes financially, but living in two different locations.

Maintaining such a relationship is hard, but it can be done, said Shunice Glasper, a Jackson State University student.

"You have to work twice as hard when you are in a long distance relationship," said Glasper, 21 of Clarksdale, who has been involved in a long-distance relationship for four years. "You must keep communication lines open and stay 100 percent devoted to the relationship at all times."

Glasper said she talks to her boyfriend, who lives in Memphis, about three times a day. She said the conversations are usually quick but informative. The couple spends time together about two weekends each month.

University of Southern Mississippi student Drina Perry said the greater the distance, the less likely a relationship is to work. Perry said it is hard to trust someone far away for a long period of time.

"Long distance relationships do not work," Perry said. "None of my long distance relationships have worked in the past for me. The only thing you can really do is talk on the phone. Talking on the phone might be rare because of conflicting schedules."

USM student Corina Warren agreed.

"Long distance relationships do not work because people meet other people and start doing other things," she said.

Myron Burns, a USM psychology doctoral candidate, said long distance relationships can be successful but they take hard work. To make it work, the couple must have trust, be secure and keep communication lines open, he said.

"Couples need to keep busy when they are apart and have a life outside of the relationship," he said.

Students said trust is important in making any relationship work, but essential in long-distance situations. Trust will prevent most arguments, Jeffrey Bertucci, a 20-year-old student at Louisiana State University, has a girlfriend of three years at USM.

"At first, it was hard for us to date," he said. "We are from the same hometown, so we went from seeing each other every day for a year to maybe once a week. We would fight all the time about stupid stuff. It was almost like if we were fighting, then I wouldn't miss her as much."

"We both just realized that we should both enjoy college, stop overreacting and just trust each other. Our relationship has been fine ever since," Bertucci said.

Some long distance relationships eventually turn into long-distance marriages, according to the book Sociology of Families. The book said there are more than a million married couples who live in separate residences in the United States today.

"Commuter couples," the book said, often find their relationships work because they are in two different places.

New Mexico

By Ali Ellis
Daily Lobo (U. New Mexico)

(U-WIRE) ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. – University of New Mexico associate professor Natasha Kolchevska recently won a $122,772 grant to develop an interdisciplinary program to explore Pyotr Tchaikovsky's opera Eugene Onegin.

The grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities will fund a four-week institute to study the opera and Alexander Pushkin's poem by the same name.

The program, "Opera, Giving Voice to Culture: Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin," will bring high school teachers from across the country to study the opera and its relationship to Russian culture, Kolchevska said. Participants will attend two performances of Onegin at the beginning and end of the four-week program so they can gauge changes in their understanding of the text and opera, Kolchevska said.

The program is unique because it will work with the Santa Fe Opera performance of Onegin, she said. The institute will utilize live performance — not just written texts — as primary source material for analysis of 19th century Russian society, Kolchevska said.

"Performance is different than the written text — different but equally valid," she said. "Music and lyrics and acting and staging all reinforce each other."

Teachers don't need to have exposure to Russian culture she said, but they do need to have backgrounds in the arts.

Alexander Pushkin, who penned Eugene Onegin during the 1830s, is considered the father of Russian literature and his poem is held to be the classic of Russian literature of the period, she said. Tchaikovsky wrote the opera toward the end of the 19th century by which time immense social and economic changes had taken place in Russia, she said.

"Culture was not in the hands of the aristocrats anymore and that shows in the opera," Kolchevska said.

The poem is a comedy of manners, featuring the relationship between the title character, a St. Petersburg sophisticate, and young, naive Tatyana. The story features themes of falling in love too early, perhaps with the wrong person, and not being able to recognize love at the right times in your life. It deals with compatibility and incompatibility. According to Kolchevska, the story is full of love and regret, selfless sacrifice and tensions between the city and country that are still evident in Russia today.

Music and art historians will be brought in to supplement the program, which takes an interdisciplinary approach.

"We have art, music, theater and historical dimensions," Kolchevska said.

Studying and viewing opera is important, Kolchevska maintained, because it has the ability not only to make us think, but to move us.

"We are such a visual culture and opera is part of that," she said.

Kolchevska said that after the institute, teachers will be able to bring the unique experience of being part of something live into their classrooms. Moreover, the institute will provide insight into the troubled legacies of in Art and Neuroscience, also questioned Small's rationale.

"If a child is born with fetal alcohol syndrome, and its mother turns to the government for aid and health care, shouldn't the government be able to make some restrictions on bringing that sort of child into the world?" she asked.

Other attendees expressed a sense that Small was ignoring the negative aspects of drug usage.

"My concern is that, even though I can understand how we might be better off without drug laws, it's still not a [good situation]," said Rachel Speer, a freshman. "I don't see how your policy addresses that clearly. There are drug problems whether we have drug laws or not."

In response to a question about the connections of race and the war on drugs, Small decried current drug policies as racist. She pointed out that a far higher percentage of people of color are incarcerated for using and selling drugs than whites.

"Go to any state in this country," she said. "Got to prisons, and see who's there. There's no state that doesn't have more black, brown and poor people in prison [for drugs] than anybody else."

She attacked the mentality that white women need to be protected from drug-using men of color. She said that she was especially disturbed by a scene from the film Traffic [a movie she said she otherwise admired], which showed a black drug dealer taking advantage of young white woman.

"The one thing they [should not have done] was show a black man administering drugs to a white woman so that he could have his way with her sexually," she said. "Other than Don Cheadle, the only black guy you saw was the naked drug dealer standing over the naked white girl."

In concluding her lecture, Small urged that Americans not turn away from what she sees as a violation of civil liberties.

"You might say, 'I'm not the police officer who arrested these people. I'm not the judge who sentenced these people. Why am I accountable?' But you are accountable – for what a society does in your name."

■ Campbell

The main point that Campbell tried to emphasize in the film is that the fans "expect that person to be that character." He is trying to lift the shroud that covers this gray area. Ted Raimi, a fellow actor, makes the point that, "they want a certain thing in you. That's what they're paying for. We as actors run a very fine line of giving them what they want, but not giving too much away." In one scene, Bruce decides to go in a Martinee shirt because he wanted to be more approachable and also for the fact that "unfortunately, these maniacs can drink during the show."

Convention goers who felt chastised for what they like, had the opportunity to be at a place where they wouldn't be ostracized for their race, religion or belief. It made a difference in their lives and gave them an outlet to have fun. Campbell recognized the interests of his fans and tried to empathize with them.

"They're still holding on to being a child," said Harry Knowles, a convention goer. "It's a way to get away from all of their day-to-day problems."

"I am who I am," said Campbell. "I sit with them, tell jokes and sign autographs. Actors have an obligation to the fans to acknowledge them, to interact to some degree. And fans have to realize as part of their yin and yang that they cannot always be able to crawl into the head of the person that they watch on television, because they're not that character. And sometimes they want to be left alone, so as long as the yin and yang find a balance, then everything's groovy."

After the video, Campbell walked onstage to begin the second half of the presentation. He began reading a passage from his book on the Chapter of Fanalysis and compared his idolization with icons such as Dough McClure and Steve McQueen.

"As a seventeen year old kid fresh out of high school, I had my first brush with celebrity as a theatre apprentice," Campbell read. "There I met a number of 'famous' people and worked among them for three months. Meeting actors in person who I idolized as a kid was both a thrilling and horrifying experience. More than anything I learned that celebrities aged just like normal people. Weird, isn't it?"

As Campbell continued, he reminisced about how his fan base grew. He remarked how that it wasn't until The Adventures of Brisco County Jr. that he began to capture a wider range of viewers than those who followed the three Evil Dead series. More regular viewers meant more fan mail, and more fan mail meant a wider range of fan appreciation. He began to see at conventions different aspects of fans converging and inspiring one side of "cowboys," to another side of "leather clad, spiked deadites."

After a few more passages, he went to answer a few questions from the audience. The questions ranged from, "what it's like recording voice-overs for video games?" to "what was easier to do, movies or TV shows?" Every time an audience would ask a question, he would go into an anecdote about everything and anything. There were no questions asked that Campbell did not reply to with a comical answer.

"It's just hard to get excited," replied Campbell, regarding his reaction to the recent release of the Army of Darkness toys, "when they come out ten years after the movie was made."

After answering more questions, it was time for the book signing. Long lines of fans, brandishing his new book and memorabilia, formed immediately after the announcement was made. There were people that came from as far away as New York, just to meet Campbell up close and personal and have their picture taken with him.

"I liked it a lot," said Anders Rasmussen, a student of the University of Massachusetts in Boston. "I had no idea of what to expect, but he was funny and had a good sense of humor. His personality was what I expected it to be."

The Rules Committee would appoint the committee's nine positions, which will be chaired by a faculty member. The Senate expects the Ad Hoc Committee to provide at least, "a progress report or a final statement to the Faculty Senate at the penultimate Faculty Senate Meeting of each year."

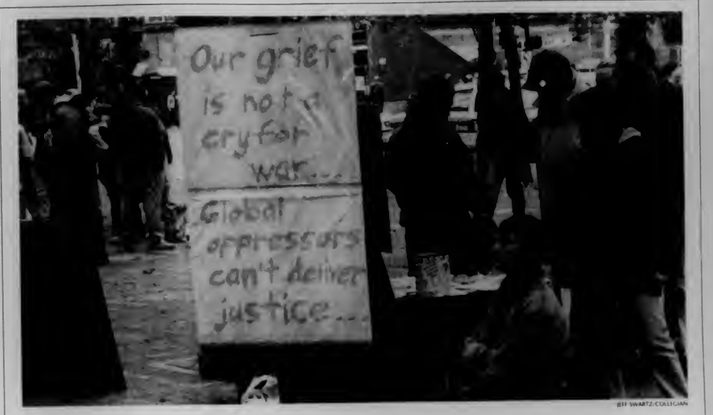
and because the campus media is far removed from the public eye, Shea explained that he was less concerned about the possibility of receiving a letter with the bacteria in it.

"We get a lot of mail in all different kinds of packages," Shea said. "When I am opening up a package with a press release or a CD, [anthrax] crosses my mind. But it does not affect the way that I deal with the mail."



The incidents stopped being strictly media-based yesterday when a letter that was sent to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office in Washington. The capitol police tested the envelope and preliminary reports showed that it turned up positive for anthrax. All mail delivery to the Capitol has been temporarily suspended while the incident is being dealt with and public tours have also been put on hold.

President George W. Bush, explained in a televised appearance that although there was not any conclusive evidence that the government had not ruled out the possibility that Osama bin Laden was behind the anthrax scares.

"There may be some possible link. We have no hard data yet. But it's clear that Mr. bin Laden is a man who is an evil man. He and his spokesmen are openly bragging about how they hope to inflict more pain on our country. So we're watching every piece of evidence," Bush said.

According to information provided by the Center for Disease Control, anthrax is a disease that is caused by spore-forming bacteria contracted from infected animals or from infected tissue. It can be spread three ways: through the blood stream when spores enter through an open cut, in airborne form or by eating the undercooked meat of an animal that is infected. Symptons for cutaneous (skin) anthrax include raised black bumps on the body where the virus came in contact with the skin, and flu like symptoms in the case of airborne anthrax.

The illness can be treated effectively with anti-biotics.

UHouston student files suits against paper

By Tim Williams
The Daily Cougar (U. Houston)

(U-WIRE) HOUSTON – A University of Houston student filed a discrimination lawsuit Thursday against The Daily Cougar and editor in chief Nikie Johnson, citing her decision not to hire him as a staff opinion writer.

In the suit, filed in Harris County civil court, ShakaZulu Assegai VII alleges that Johnson (who is white) refused to publish his letters because he is, as he states, "an African mentally and physically" and because of his gender. Both are violations of his rights under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the lawsuit claims.

In his suit, which he filed pro se (on his own behalf), Assegai demands to be hired in an opinion columnist position and that all his previous letters be published. Additionally, he is seeking a total of $11 million in general, punitive and mental anguish damages.

Assegai claims that Johnson wouldn't allow his views to be published again following an Aug. 29 letter to the editor because he stated in the letter that "no gays, homosexuals or lesbians would be allowed to join the Africans Coming Home Foundation, and that there were no exceptions to the rules."

Assegai is the founder of a repatriation group called the Africans Coming Home Foundation which, as he outlines in an Oct. 27 letter to Johnson that wasn't published, seeks to take "true African-Americans" home so that they can rebuild the "African-Empire."

While Assegai forbids "homosexuals, bisexuals and drug addicts" from joining the foundation, "people like Iron Mike Tyson will be allowed to join," he wrote.

"The Plaintiff gave the Editor in Chief 14 days to publish some of the letters. And (sic) give the Plaintiff a position as an opinion columnist," the suit states. "The Plaintiff waited for 14 days, but the Defendant fail (sic), neglected, or simply, Refused (sic) to comply."

In a letter to Assegai prior to his filing, UH General Counsel Dennis Duffy stated that he could not find any basis for reversing Johnson's decisions.

The Daily Cougar is a student-run news-paper partially supported by Student Service Fees. It currently employs 15 staff opinion writers. All final editorial decisions, including hiring and firing of staff, are made by its student editor in chief, who is appointed by a committee of students and faculty.

According to the paper's policies, published on Page 3 of every issue, UH and The Daily Cougar seek "to provide equal educational opportunities without regard to race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, handicap or veteran status."

The paper's stated policy regarding columns is, "Guest Opinion columns will be accepted at the editor's discretion and are subject to editing for clarity, content and space."

Earlier this year, Assegai filed a suit in federal court alleging violations of his civil rights by a host of executive branch officials, including the U.S. Attorney General. It was dismissed "with prejudice" meaning he cannot file a similar claim in that jurisdiction earlier this month because the court found that Assegai failed to state a claim.

Assegai also filed a $28 million suit in Harris County court on Oct. 8 that alleges the State of Texas refused to protect him from discrimination. Jim Crow laws and the Ku Klux Klan.

War means honor
Flags should remain

CNN uncovered a big stink this weekend in a little town. It's not really news to us, though, because The Great Amherst Flag Drama has been playing out for over two months now.

Things change though. The drama started when one of our Physics professors, Jennie Traschen, foolishly made the mistake of trashing the flag in a September 10 Amherst Select Board meeting. The flags had been flying since August 29, when our town put up 29 flags to appease a group of veterans.

It's a good guess that Traschen deeply regrets her remarks, or at the very least, the timing of them. After all, she did make them the day before all of our lives changed in the tragedy. "It's [the flag] a symbol of terrorism and death and fear and destruction and repression," she said.

Nevertheless, the point of this editorial is not to condemn Traschen. As horrible as her remarks are, that has been done enough.

Instead, concentration should be paid to how long these flags are going to stay up. The plan at the current time is to leave the flags up until Veteran's Day. That plan should be changed.

Across the nation and even across the globe, American flags are flying high in a sign of solidarity. They're everywhere we go lately. Is this corny? Perhaps. Is this the right thing to do at the current time, though? Absolutely.

Amherst should nix any and all plans that it has of taking down the flags. Americans are flying flags from their cars, light posts, and homes. For Amherst to step away from this wave of patriotism in another month makes no sense.

We have been told time and time again that this new war we are fighting is going to be a sustained mission. It won't be over anytime soon – it's going to take perseverance and persistence to complete the mission that President Bush has undertaken, if it is possible to complete it at all. It could take years for the Unites States to return to some semblance of the way things used to be.

Likewise, those flags should remain flying. For as long as it takes, America needs any and every reminder that can be given to show that we are not invincible, and that we have duties as citizens that no one should forget. That is what the American flag stands for now – it's a reminder of the respect we should carry for our fallen countrymen and for the duties we all have as American citizens.

The town of Amherst may as well admit publicly that the flags in town will remain up indefinitely. Because even if the Select Board were to pull the ultimate boner of taking down the flags a mere two months after the disaster occurred and a month into our military campaign, someone would have the right idea. Most likely, Amherst's veterans would put more flags up.

Time to rethink notions of flag

MELODY ZAGAMI

When the U.S.S. Cole sank, Amherst High refused to fly its flag at half-mast to memorialize the soldiers that had lost their lives in the explosion.

In the fall of 1999, a high school performance of "West Side Story" was cancelled because members of the community thought it racist.

On September 5, twenty-nine American flags flying in downtown Amherst were taken down because certain townsfolk complained.

The Hampshire Gazette reported that Town Manager Barry Del Castillo received 30 complaints from townspeople who felt that the flags were okay once in awhile but there was no need to fly them over an "extended period."

The town of Amherst, as I've learned in my three and a quarter years here, is totally fd up, "Zagami, can't you think of a more appropriate word? Do you have to resort to obscenity and truck driver speak?"

No, no I can't, because that's the best word to describe our little college town. Sometimes I'm really surprised that Amherst allows us to sing the National Anthem at sporting events or that it gives Veteran's Day off to the schoolchildren.

In regard to what's happened over the past month, I wonder if those who filed complaints about the flags have moved on to bitch about something else now. Probably not. I suppose if you live in the Twilight Zone, the way the locals do, you're excused from unnecessary protest. Hey, you live in a five-college town. You're among the "edumicated." You're enlightened to the ways of the world – you can quote Dickinson, you get your coffee from Starbucks and you have a right to complain about anything you want. But now it all seems a little inappropriate and kind of a waste of time, doesn't it?

I've heard a lot of students complaining about the hyped-up patriotism, the "foolishness" of being too patriotic in a time when we need to be more sensitive toward our actions as a nation than ever before. I wonder if the citizens of other countries look down upon those who show pride in their country. I wonder if people are flying their flags now because it's all they can do.

"For the time being, I'd like to think of the flag as a symbol of awareness and as a comfort."

At the football game this weekend, I looked around and saw many members of the working class community of Amherst. They were proudly displaying "United We Stand" tee-shirts and wearing red, white and blue. Just common folk, out enjoying a game of football, trying to forget about the tragedy and enjoy a beautiful fall day. They might not have been the most educated or most enlightened representation of Amherst, South Hadley, or Belchertown, but they represent the largest part of our nation.

One of the flag protesters wrote that the extended display of flags diminishes the significance of important historical dates. Her letter (printed in the Hampshire Gazette) read, "Flags flying continuously can become humdrum, frivolous, ordinary, easily ignored as they merge into the background of posters, signs, advertisements, and detritus."

Now, only someone from Amherst would use the word "detritus" in a complaint letter. I don't even know what that word means, but I'm from Eastern Mass. Maybe she's changed her mind since September 11. She probably hasn't. How can a flag be easily ignored? Do flags flying constantly in large numbers cause them to be insignificant? Are we as a nation right now diminishing the meaning of the stars and stripes by overzealous display?

The man who bought the flags to fly downtown is a veteran. Two of his veteran buddies helped to put them up. To them the flag isn't a symbol of sacrilege, but rather a memorial to their friends and to the time they served for their country. I think that the protests to the flags run a little deeper than the humdrumness and frivolity. What's really eating them is that the flags represent those who held a gun for their country. I'm a student here and I'm well aware that our flag represents oppression, unfairness and Barnes and Noble chains. For the time being, I'd like to think of the flag as a symbol of awareness and as a comfort. I'm not going to wrap myself in it and run through the streets of Amherst – I'd probably be taken captive and pelted with locally grown produce. But I'm going to acknowledge what it symbolizes for the present moment, instead of its past implications.

We are an educated community. We read books, we sip lattes and are quick to judge the masses and think less of them. That should stop. In a community where equality is fought for all the time, we can be quite hypocritical when it comes to the views of the assumed Joe Six-Pack. Chances are, he's the first one who would fight to protect your right to bitch.

Question identity In a foreign land

SHARON STIMPFLE

What does being an American mean to me? I find myself tackling this question miles from my homeland. Across the Atlantic, in fact, where sympathetic eyes and consoling words greet an identity unfolded.

"I'm from New Jersey." I reply in the smoky pubs of Dublin, Ireland, where the landscape calls for rounds of pints and songful dance. It's a question quite commonly asked in an atmosphere of kinship.

"Where are you from?" The question is intended to start up the play-by-play of getting to know someone. But the "I'm sorry," with only best intentions that is quick to follow since September 11 only draws me further away from the speaking party. I suppose it is a reaction I'm not used to.

But it's more importantly, one that I don't want to get used to. One I feel I shouldn't have to.

I've never felt so distant from my country. I've never felt so connected. Among the many international and Irish students who swarm the campus of the University College of Dublin, there exists a small community of American students bonded by the tragic events of September 11.

We were in a registration line when the news broke.

It couldn't be true. We begged to reject it.

But as soon as the horrific images presented themselves in the media, we reacted. Dodging to the phone booths, requesting country codes through unbroken sobs, we called home, some of us not yet equipped with calling cards – only to meet the horror of busy lines and experience the uneasiness of unanswered questions.

I would find out much later – upon line connection and unimaginable tones of interaction – that many of these Americans would find their loved ones unaccounted for.

There were those directly affected. Those with whom you could offer nothing more than your company, hoping that your somewhat familiar presence would ease the foreignness of their surroundings, their situation and their forever altered perception of 'home'.

I found it particularly difficult to deal with the realization that the young man living in the apartment next to mine, who lost his uncle in the World Trade Center attacks wouldn't be flying home to attend the funeral service. His parents thought it best for him to not make the trip. Even today, in passing, I note the pain marked in his eyes and reflect upon the many who are grieving for the lost, back in the states and around the world.

What does being an American mean to me?

In the past few weeks it has meant taking refuge in the small campus chapel and trying to come to terms with the fact that I will no longer be able to gaze across the Hudson and find the Twin Towers standing so proud, symbolic as that may be.

It has meant that I thank God every day. In my own family, though there was a close call, all are safe and well.

It has meant that I pray every day for the suffering. I pray for our country.

It has meant that I am having a hard time responding to the apologies, let alone the peace rallies that crowd the city center with anti-Bush campaigns.

It has meant that I have taken personal sentimentality to the flowers that surround the American Embassy, and the "day of mourning" that was issued for the first time ever by the country of Ireland.

But – more powerfully – it has meant that no matter how far from home I may be right now, the courage and unity of the American people has been made known.

To me, to the others, to the world.

And in this time of uncertainty and grief we wear our national badges of identity.

We stand proud.

We stand inspired: by our country, and further, by our people.

Peace demonstration is just insulting

ELIZABETH PARISEAU

The anti-war "demonstration" held outside the Student Union on October 10 was worse than meaningless. Sadly, I don't think that the six people with bullhorns and the couple dozen students who had found an excuse to get out of class fully realized what the rally was: a profound and manifold insult.

It is insulting to me personally to be heckled by those with a political view they feel they need to force on me as I walk by them. If I'm not attending your rally, I just might have a reason. I would ask those people to simply respect that, but it's already clear that they have respect for very little beside themselves.

It is an insult to those who died a month ago simply because they reported for work in the morning, or who died trying to rescue others, to suggest that this attack will go unanswered.

It is an insult to the intelligence of the surviving people of this country to suggest that our freedoms will not be defended. We have been, in the words of Roosevelt, "suddenly and deliberately attacked." This isn't the Gulf of Tonkin; this is Pearl Harbor. And the ancestors of mine who gave their lives after Pearl Harbor did so for the best of reasons. For protesters with nothing but a head full of hippie jargon and ill-advised access to a bullhorn to suggest otherwise is an insult.

It is an insult to our government and to its care and deliberation in responding to the terrible events of September 11, to suggest that this has been an impulsive action. We have given the Taliban almost a full month to agree to turn over one man, and they refused. Then when we bombed them, they cried foul. They waved around an "estimate" that 20 civilians had been killed. Gee, I wonder what that's like? We only lost more than 10 times that many firemen alone. For the Taliban to wave a comparatively miniscule death toll in our faces when they've had more than ample chance to prevent it is insulting to the memories of those who were given no warning and no chance by the man Afghanistan now protects.

It is also insulting to our government to suggest that its actions have been unwarranted. Mr. bin Laden and his organization have already killed American sailors on board the USS Cole and American officials at the US Embassy in Kenya. Those affiliated with Mr. bin Laden have also had a hand in attacks on our allies in Israel. Until this most recent and most despicable attack on mass numbers of our civilians, we have neither retaliated nor interfered. For protesters to suggest that we continue the kind of pacifism that has already made us a target is an insult.

But most of all, so-called "peace" rallies are an insult to our soldiers now overseas, who have given up their homes, families and comforts, and who risk giving up their lives. For protesters to suggest that they deserve anything less than our gratitude is insulting. And for what it's worth, I'd much rather support a soldier willing to give up his life and livelihood for mine than a protester who lets someone else fight In his place while he hides behind peace.

And so, peace-loving protesters stop your heckling. I will not join your little rally. I've got better things to do, like supporting my country and honoring the dead. And I've realized something you obviously haven't. War will not be easy or without pain; the truly courageous thing never Is. But peace as we know it is impossible.

Bruce Campbell: B-Actor or A-God?
Cinematic icon discusses fans, industry with Collegian

Bruce Campbell Book Signing
Mount Holyoke College, Gamble Auditorium
October 14

Bruce Campbell is a lot of things: he is a writer, he is a producer, he is an infamous Hollywood B-movie actor. However, above all, Campbell is grateful to his fans. He accepts them in all of their various colors, shapes, trendy T-shirts and sizes.

Case in point, Campbell signed every single book and piece of memorabilia for about 400 fans at this venue alone, and that is not including the several other signings he had been to before this one. Sure Campbell was promoting his new book If Chins Could Kill: Confessions of a B Movie Actor, but that doesn't mean jack. Campbell was exceedingly nice: he shook hands, allowed multiple pictures and even engaged in witty small talk. He does more than he has to at these shindigs, a lot more. He even granted a stuttering college student an interview. It is my personal belief that B-movies have given Campbell a unique perspective on life.

Campbell knows he owes the fans for his fame and not some soul-sucking movie critic that can be bought by the studio at the drop of a dime (bag or other). I firmly believe that this knowledge has kept Campbell as respectable as you can possibly be, while still living in California.

Campbell read some brief excerpts from his new autobiography at this semi-deadite gathering. They were hilarious, he writes like he talks: quip after quip. These excerpts included: condescending e-mails from insane fans, gifts from psychotic fans (more on this in a second) and interesting information about some films he has been in.

About the gifts from psychotic fans, the story goes: A fan meets Campbell, the fan then proceeds to give Campbell his tassel from graduation stating "Brisco County Junior saved my life, if it wasn't for that show I would have killed myself and never graduated." Campbell stares at the audience and says "folks, if you are one TV show away from ending it all...I can't help you." (long pause) "Welcome to my world." It's true, a lot of his fans seem absolutely nuts. It's surprising he even leaves his house, let alone sits down with crazed fans to shoot the breeze.

Campbell spent the better part of 4 years writing this book. I am sure that it was probably one of the most frustrating and tedious things he has ever done. It deserves to be read. Campbell has a great story to tell, I know, I read the book and I laughed my butt off. If Chins Could Kill, Confessions of a B Movie Actor is worth the buy, and Bruce Campbell is worth your undivided attention.

At around 12:00 on Monday I interrupted Bruce Campbell while he was pumping gas via cell phone.

Daily Collegian: Hello? Bruce, it's Tim Letteney.
Bruce Campbell: ...ehh
DC: From the UMass Daily Collegian
BC: Oh, hey.
DC: If you are busy I can call back.
BC: Nah, I am just pumping gas. You wanna do this thing?
DC: Yeah, that would be great. OK, I am just going to fire away.
BC: Shoot.
DC: In If Chins Could Kill, you state that your father was a large influence in your decision to act. Were there any other key factors that lead to Bruce Campbell the actor?
BC: Yeah, sure. I didn't want to have to wear a gray flannel suit and work in a cubicle for the rest of my life. My father toed the line. I didn't want to toe the line.
DC: There is definitely a thread of autonomy that runs through your book. Do you feel that this autobiography provided you with a voice in an otherwise voiceless profession?
BC: There is not much voice in the way of value of B-movie people. I am taking a stand for people who can't get a hot script, or can't get huge amounts of money for special effects.
DC: Where do B-movies stand in Hollywood?
BC: B-movies are the farm team for Hollywood.
DC: Do you have any advice for upcoming filmmakers?
BC: Learn your craft. Realize that everyone can't be famous immediately. Make a series of short films on digital video, use the technology of today. It makes everything so much easier than it used to be with super. I like the idea of new technology giving power to the individual.
DC: Kind of like Blair Witch?
BC: Blair Witch was great, but the only problem with that is now you have Joe Dickwad in Indiana making movies, and he really shouldn't be. Not everybody can be in the film business. Once I had a fan come up to me and say "Bruce, I am in school to be a doctor but I really want be an actor, what should I do?" It's unbelievable.
DC: How do you think the Mount Holyoke book signing went?
BC: I was really happy with the crowd.
DC: There were a couple dicks though.
BC: Yeah but I prepare for the dicks. I have a vaccine.
DC: How was your book writing experience? Do you have any plans to write another?
BC: I wrote If Chins Could Kill over four years, so it wasn't the most difficult thing I have ever done. At times it was hard to keep perspective. I am in talks to pitch a new book.
DC: Can you tell us what it might be about?
BC: I would have to kill you...
DC: Ahh yes, the deathsthing.
BC: It is going to be non-fiction, and it will not deal with the film business.
DC: What is better about writing books than making films?
BC: It is harder to chew up a book. You actually have to go pick it up.
(Loud Sirens)
DC: Bruce are you getting pulled over?
BC: No, it was an ambulance for some Holyoke student that binged too much last night, probably at UMass student...probably.
(Loud Sirens)
BC: There goes another ambulance to pump the stomach of a UMass student.
DC: Any thoughts about where we are right now as a nation?
BC: A friend of mine won't fly, and right now I am living like a gypsy promoting this book. We have to go on. We are not used to this type of lifestyle yet. Before this the biggest problem in our day was, "Do you want fries with that?" This type of event makes your skin tougher.
DC: Thanks for your time Bruce. I have to get to class.
BC: Give a call back if you want to ask any more questions.
DC: Thanks a lot man, have a great day.
BC: Take care."

Snap, crackle, teen pop

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Ask any elementary school girl about her current thoughts on the Backstreet Boys and get ready to receive a snippy "Nobody listens to them anymore" line. Ah, the beauty of teen pop. Here today, gone tomorrow.

For the past five years, whether in music, movies or TV, teenagers have been the rulers of the entertainment kingdom. Rising industry endeavors geared at teens, made easier by a booming economy, became instantly successful and translated to a multi-billion dollar industry.

But 2001 has seen a slow crumbling of the industry's core audience and cities have consequently been quick to proclaim teen pop has gone boom.

SCREAM SCARES UP TREND

Spurred by a booming economy and a growing number of teens (51 million and counting) the late '90s became a breeding ground for all things bubblegum.

Scream, the Kevin Williamson-directed slasher flick, first kicked off the trend by grossing an impressive $103 million and spawning two sequels and countless teen genre flicks. High school love stories like She's All That ($63.4 million) and gross-out tales such as American Pie ($102.6 million) also cashed in on the ever-growing trend. "Party of Five" alum Jennifer Love Hewitt (remember her?) became the princess of all things pop in 1997 with the release of several films, most notably I Know What You Did Last Summer (72.6 million). By the end of 1997, teens had even sailed choppy seawaters making Titanic the highest-grossing movie of all time (anchoring in over $600 million in the States alone!).

The TV domain couldn't escape the trend either. "Buffy" slew the competition and created a teen girl powerhouse transforming the WB into a credible network. In 1998, "Dawson's Creek" became the WB's highest rated program (and kissed "90210" goodbye!). The Carson Daly hosted "TRL" debuted in Sept. 1998 and quickly became MTV's highest rated show.

And who could forget the music world where countless acts have transformed the charts into a veritable bubble-gum blowing, peach-fuzz sporting, midriff-baring playground?

The Spice Girls added Spice to the music world in early 1997 (selling over 7 million units domestically). Hanson followed months later with the irresistibly catchy "MMMBop."

A rather pleasant "Disturbance"

COURTESY MASS MOCA

Domestic Disturbance runs through February.

By Martha Olivo
Collegian Correspondent

The visitor to MASS MoCA – the Museum of Contemporary Art in North Adams, Massachusetts – is greeted by a row of upside-down trees. The trees, planted in pots and suspended by wires, are aware that it is fall and are behaving appropriately – changing color and shedding.

They seem unashamed if not entirely-unaware of their awkward positions, though the visitor feels a bit embarrassed for them. They are, in effect, MASS MoCA's greeting committee and they seem to say, "Better get used to it now, because it only gets stranger inside."

And indeed it does. On exhibit through February 4, 2002 on the second floor of the massive factory building which houses the museum, is Mona Hatoum's Domestic Disturbance. The bulk of the collection is household items on an industrial scale.

At the top of the stairs one comes upon a birdcage that passes for a studio apartment. It has a wood frame and is enclosed by metal bars; its floor is a metal tray that pulls out for easy cleaning; its front end has a bathtub-sized food trough that also pulls out. It is at first comical, but laughter soon gives way to cringing as the viewer imagines herself as the inhabitant of this cage, using her floor as a toilet and watching the world pass her by.

That is the theme of the exhibition set. The next two pieces are Slicer, a plastic and metal hard-boiled egg slicer, whose scale invites visions of gruesomely silenced screaming babies, and La Grande Broyease, an old-fashioned hand-operated grater that could make short work of a small cow, with its three round, eight-foot blades laid out beside it to confirm the viewer's feeling that Hatoum likens domesticity to life as a caged animal. Hatoum has chosen to enlarge dangerous kitchen items so that they loom and haunt like characters in a nightmare.

Accompanying the cage, slicer and grater, are two works entitled Vicious Cycle and Untitled (Wheelchair II). Vicious Cycle is a series of green glass bottles arranged on the floor in a circle, like dogs that have just met, nose to butt. In the context of the home, such bottles, and such a title, remind one of alcoholism.

The bottles' placement into the hard wood floors and arrangement tone blindly following the next) rob them of their dignity. Furthermore there is their color to consider. Are they green with envy, illness, inexperience? Is this alcoholism – a loss of dignity and sophistication, a poisoned self – to Hatoum's mind, the culmination of domesticity?

Untitled (Wheelchair II) – as the title would suggest – a wheelchair reproduced with a few twists. The most obvious of these is that the chair leans forward as if it were racing along, lurching forward with the intent of ejecting its inhabitant. The chair is made of the thinnest metal with the gleam of a coroner's table. Its surfaces are hard, unmoving. And in what is perhaps the cruelest of the Untitled's twists, the handles that one would use to push the chair are of the thinnest metal and mimic a serrated knife. To some of course, a wheelchair is home. Thus, is this wheelchair another example of Hatoum's cruel spin on home life? How...she seems to be asking, could anybody live with these items, in this home?

In the second room of the exhibit, Hatoum has filled a cage with six items that seem to sum-up the theme of the show. They are: a sieve and slotted spoon, both of whose holes are plugged by metal screws; a shiny metal boomerang; a model brain; and a tandem cup and saucer, joined at the side to form one trough-like cup with two handles. All of these items have been rendered useless, the sieve and spoon by the plugging of their holes, the boomerang by virtue of its being in the case, the brain by its lack of attachment to a human and the cup and saucer by its for-two design. Hatoum has grouped these useless items together in a case, which we may assume she likens to a home where the boomerang feels stifled, the cup can't function because it is joined for life to another and the brain has disconnected altogether. And what kind of a home, what kind of a life is this? But then what kind of a home, what kind of a life do we live?

Oliver Stone's America

By Dave Cuozzo

WASHINGTON — When mainstream [illegible] of film directors, they will often [illegible] Spielberg and George Lucas. When [illegible] Oliver Stone, more people associate [illegible] mixed with film. Stone is no ordinary film[illegible] and honest, never compromising in his [illegible] include J.F.K., Platoon, and the still con[illegible] Born Killers. [illegible] at American University, Stone invited [illegible] whatever they wanted with him in a fire[illegible] atmosphere. When the recent attacks on [illegible] brought to the forefront, it started a heated [illegible] students, professors and Stone about [illegible] and what to do next. Even if you have [illegible] will find you out to talk about what [illegible] people do that and like my work. It [illegible] Lamy, his unsuccessful film noir [illegible] failed. It was a small movie with a lot of [illegible] and I didn't have the right to do it. [illegible] political or that shit. One day, I think peo[illegible] will see what we tried to do."

[illegible] still maintain melancholy in his voice. In a time when many directors make films for profit, it's interesting to talk to a director who takes his films so seriously. One of Oliver Stone's most critical successes was 95's Nixon the brilliant epic starring Anthony Hopkins. Yet, that film didn't do well at the box office, especially compared to J.F.K.

"Nixon wasn't appreciated, and it was a lot of work. I think Tony Hopkins is just brilliant in it, specially for not looking like the man. It wasn't as dynamic as J.F.K., and you're dealing with guys with bad haircuts and such. Nixon turns off kids; there's a predisposition about him. The marketing wasn't very good either... A poster with him just glaring at the audience was a bad idea.

Contrasting Nixon, Stone's 1994 film, Natural Born Killers was a success despite protests from almost everyone imaginable. One of the most brave films of the 90's, the film chronicles Mickey and Mallory, a serial killing couple. The film gives us the couple and the media that obsesses about them in a hallucinatory way on-screen. Does Stone think such a movie could be made today in a post-Columbine America?

"No, it was very much a film of its time. I had just come back from doing Heaven and Earth and the film came out of TV. I just saw all this tabloid crap everywhere, it just hit me. These were the reasons for TV and it was disgusting. Trivia had become news, another entertainment source. I found (Quentin) Tarantino's script at the bottom of my pile. It really was a B-movie script, Roger Corman like about 2 killers on the run. I married his film with my ideas from what I saw on TV."

Natural Born Killers has become a real cult movie, one that posters are sold of at every poster sale at ALL campus. In talking with Stone, I asked him what his reaction is to that film having a youth following today.

"I think it is because of the irony. Kids who get it understand it and appreciate it. I was enwrapped in a law-suit for 5-6 years with (writer) John Grisham. (John Grisham) sued Stone after a friend of his was killed in a robbery that the film was blamed for influencing). It cost millions of dollars...50-60 murders have been associated with the film. Personally, I don't think anyone kills because of a movie. I think the idea has to already be there."

Stone also talked about having a class at AU and other universities around the nation.

"I think its important kids get a view of history. It's recent history. I saw people trying to forget after I came back from Vietnam. People forget and history comes from the upper class down, writing the stories they saw. That view can be way short and sometimes its downright wrong."

Oliver Stone is working on a number of projects now, and he has stated that he's "flattered and honored" that there is a class about his work and that kids are taking it. One will hope that Stone continues to make films that not only entertain but make people think about the world in maybe a different light.

Where has Hanson gone? All that Mmm-Boppy goodness is missing from our well-balanced pop breakfast.

After years of European success, America finally quit playin' games with their hearts and embraced the Backstreet Boys (a total of 55 million albums sold to date). We wanted it that way – the pop was that is. 'NSync later tears it up (25 million) and Britney Spears hits us for the first time (22 million).

And the rest is history.

TEEN POP GOES BOOM?

But the fickle audience of teens burst these bubbles as fast as they blew them. Valentine, released earlier this year ($20.4 million), Summer Catch ($19.5 million), and Freddy Got Fingered ($14.2 million) failed to muster much teen appeal.

ADD-afflicted teens also alienated the aforementioned TV shows, including "Felicity." And new teen TV shows failed to successfully materialize last season as evidenced by the cancelled "Popular" and "Goose Bumps."

Perusing this week's charts it looks like teen pop's existence is truly fading. The only act to bubble under the top 20 Billboard Album chart is 'NSync with Celebrity. But even the biggest boy band in the world has experienced some fan alienation. No Strings Attached, the precursor to Celebrity, sold a record setting 2.4 million units in one week. When Celebrity arrived this past summer it moved 1.88 million units – a respectable number by any measure, but falling short of the staggering No Strings Attached figure.

'NSync's satirical lyrics in Celebrity's lead-single "Pop" truly brought the "Is teen pop over?" question to a forefront this summer. Timberlake, resident 'NSync hottie and Britney's beau, protested to bitter critics "The thing you got to realize, what we're doing is not a trend! We got the gift of melody, we're gonna bring it 'til the end." Critics laughed off the battle cry while lauding the polished boy band for bringing the two-step beats to the states.

Backstreet Boys may be the most palpable off all. The group kick started the boy band movement only to be overshadowed by larger-than-life arch nemesis 'NSync and experience a sharp decline in sales. Their last album, Black and Blue, sold 5.2 million copies, hardly comparable to the 12 million units raked in by predecessor, Millennium. Feeling the bruises, the group downscaled its current tour from stadiums to arenas. AJ's admittance into a rehab center over the summer for depression and alcoholism further flung the band into veritable darkness. Their inevitable demise is undoubtedly the reason the boys' record company five is trying to cash in one last time by issuing a greatest hits compilation album due Oct. 30.

Plunging sales of teen albums, poor audiences at teen-themed movies and diminishing ratings for teen-centered TV shows have prompted the question on everyone's collective mind, is teen pop over?

As teen stars grow older and teen pop fans get wiser, a change of love for the mushy art form may occur. Countless articles have been written by entertainment and music critics alike (many eagerly), proclaiming the death of teen pop. In fact, Entertainment Weekly devoted an entire cover story to the subject matter this summer, nearly swinging the last gash to the suffering market.

Although the layman's pop-culture bible admitted teens are an ever-growing population, it stated that the voice of teens has changed, and it will no longer cheer for the same sticky bubblegum formulas.

But earlier this year, the MTV-produced Save the Last Dance earned $89.4 million, Legally Blonde and American Pie 2, respectively, took a huge bite out of the box office this summer, grossing $93.9 million and $143.2 million (and counting) – all opposing the current mindset that the teen movement is over. Furthermore, Buffy's new home on the UPN helped Sarah Michelle Gellar sink her teeth into larger ratings. And anticipation of Britney Spears' new self-titled album due next month continues to mount.

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN TEEN POP GOES BUST?

Even if the teen phenomenon is breathing its last breath, where does entertainment go from here? Uncertain economic times (also marked by the Sept. 11 tragedy) may translate to gloomy grunge, much in the way the early-'90s recession ignited the melancholy art form. Or maybe a hip-hop fusion that continues to quietly grow more popular will emerge? Even less doubtful, what if Michael Jackson's highly hyped Invincible album turns out to be a present day music-changing Thriller?

Don't turn to the Billboard charts for any answers. Topsy-turvy taste has grown abundant on the charts this past year. The year 2001 stands as one of the most lackluster years in entertainment in recent memory. Compared to previous years, no movie has made a significant cultural impact, no music star has hit it big (with the arguable exception of Alicia Keys) and no TV show has experienced any surge in ratings. As publicity campaigns continue to be downscaled amid the Sept. 11 terrorist activities, it's unlikely any contribution to pop culture will make a significant splash.

Even if the entire teen trend derails, there's no one consensus that states that the pop starlets affiliated with the phenomenon will be tossed into utter obscurity. Who knows, maybe Britney will be the next Madonna or Justin the next Michael Jackson.

In any case, there's no question to who rules the entertainment roost – teens. With the cash and time to burn, these zit-faced, hormonally charged pre-pubescent teens will continue to dictate what is popular. However, much to the chagrin of frustrated, money-hungry, Hollywood, small screen, and record label executives, future prognoses of these ephemeral-minded culprits are nearly useless.

Duquesne drops a "Steel Curtain" on the UMass offense in an A-10 loss.

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

The dominant Pittsburgh Steelers "Steel Curtain" defense of the seventies was able to make dangerous offensive teams appear tame during its several championship seasons.

Likewise, the Pittsburgh Penguins teams of the nineties consistently bombarded their helpless foes with offensive bombs. Friday night, the Massachusetts volleyball team saw shades of both Steel City teams in being shut down by its latest conference opponent.

The Minutewomen fell to Duquesne 3-1 in Pittsburgh, as the Dukes came out with a solid performance on both sides of the ball.

The home team exploded out of the blocks to convincingly take the first two games, before the Maroon and White rebounded in the third frame. Still, the Duquesne attack proved to be too much, as the Minutewomen dropped their second straight Atlantic 10 contest.

"We didn't come out of the gates as hard as we needed," Head Coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We just played two good games and two bad ones."

Senior leader Lauren Vander Veen led the UMass attack by knocking down 15 kills while junior Clare Baxter continued her recent strong play by contributing 14 kills on the evening.

Senior Janeen DeMarte (9 kills, 10 digs) and freshman Carol Mattos (10 kills, 9 digs) also had strong outings for the Maroon and White, but the team could not match the offensive and defensive intensity of the Dukes.

"They played a nice, balanced attack, but we just couldn't get it going offensively," Kenny said. "We just didn't terminate. They hit over .350 in each game [that they won], and that was the difference."

The Minutewomen were down two games before they even knew what hit them, as the Dukes' offensive outburst gave them the first two sets of the game by scores of 30-22 and 30-19, respectively.

The team from the Steel City committed only four errors in each of those games for exceptional hitting percentages of .378 and .359 respectively.

However, the Maroon and White exited the locker room with somewhat of a spark, as they built a 17-15 lead into a 25-15 advantage, led by three aces from sophomore Nitia Small. The Minutewomen eventually won the third game 30-22 to cut their deficit to 2-1.

UMass was unable to cut into the Duquesne advantage further, however, as both squads battled in a tightly contested game in which the home team prevailed.

With the score knotted up at 25, Duquesne slowly pulled away, and finished the match off with two blocks to send the Maroon and White back to Amherst with a 3-5 record in Atlantic 10 play (9-7 overall).

"Our middle did well hitting-wise, but we didn't block well," Kenny said. "That's why their offense was so successful."

Now, the Minutewomen will look to regroup tonight by taking a break from their conference schedule to clash with interstate rival Harvard.

The Crimson comes into this evening's home matchup with a record of 8-5, and has won four of its last six matches. The team's well-balanced attack is led by superstar freshman Kaego Ogbechie (team-leading 3.81 kills/game) and senior Erin Denniston (3.78 kills/game).

Kenny singled out Ogbechie as being a player to watch on Harvard, noting, "she could have went pretty much anywhere in the country" but opted instead to play for the Crimson.

The Maroon and White is in the midst of a difficult Atlantic 10 season and faces an extremely tough Temple team this weekend, which swept UMass in Philadelphia earlier this year.

However, the Minutewomen cannot overlook their Ivy League opponent in preparation for their rematch on Friday night.

"We have to be prepared to play Friday," Kenny said. "They're going to be a lot tougher this year."

Game time is 7 p.m. tonight at Curry Hicks Cage.

Men's Tennis is fore-warning the Rams that they mean business as far as conference games go.

Minutemen: Rams right ahead

By Elena Panesis
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team usually considers the fall season a warm-up for the all-important Atlantic 10 conference matches in the spring. But that view comes with one exception: the University of Rhode Island.

The UMass squad that finished second in the conference last year to St. Bonaventure will face off against the Rams on their home court in Kingston, Rhode Island. Last year the Minutemen blanked the Rams 7-0 on the Upper Boyden courts, which should serve as momentum for the players.

"After our win against Amherst, we got a lot of confidence," freshman Scott Sans-Leeb said. "We're definitely pumped up for this match. We want to start off our conference season with a win in the Atlantic 10."

In terms of A-10 talent, the Rams finished at the bottom of the conference last year with a program that receives no scholarship monies. Considering its history against Rhode Island, Massachusetts needs to win handily tomorrow in order to gain a top conference ranking in the spring and to hold a high reputation among other A-10 schools.

"This is usually a match that URI would get up for and not us," Coach Judy Dixon said. "But we have teams coming to our home courts this year from miles away like Xavier and Dayton. URI has a bunch of hungry scramblers that give 100 percent on the court. We need to beat them in an orderly fashion tomorrow in order to stay in the top third rather than fall to the middle of the pack in the A-10. We don't want to go in there and barely squeak by."

With a solid performance in doubles against Amherst College and the University of Hartford, Dixon feels quite confident about her No. 1 and No. 2 tandems. The new No. 1 pairing of Sans-Leeb and senior captain Steve Prisco played their best match of the season against Amherst College last week, despite their lack of experience together.

"I'm very pleased with No. 1 doubles right now," Dixon said. "It's a hard situation with a senior and freshman being paired together. Steve is doing a good job as a mentor and Scott knows his role and has been playing up to that ability. Their best match was against Amherst and I hope they can carry that level of play for the rest of the season."

The top of the Minutemen's singles line-up has performed relatively well throughout the young season. With seasoned veterans Prisco and Todd Champeau leading the squad, the first three slots on the roster look solid. However, Dixon has a few questions about No's 4-6.

"We have to be careful at four, five, six," Dixon said. "I know that Todd will be Todd and that Steve will be Steve, but I really need consistent play out of Phil Rodrigues and Eric Reblin. It's also time for freshman Reid Stubbs to step up."

Stubbs, a talented Floridian freshman, hopes to up his play after losing three matches in a row to Boston University, Hartford and Amherst.

"I'm hoping to bounce back against the Rams after a three match losing streak," Stubbs said. "I just need to get my confidence up and get some more matches in."

After the Minutemen return from Rhode Island, they will need to prepare for their match against the University of Connecticut, a bitter rival that defeated the UMass squad last year, 5-2 in Storrs.

"UConn is one of our biggest rivals and we need to be physically and mentally prepared," Dixon said. "It's a match that could go either way and is more about heart. It should separate the men from the boys."

A-10 ingredient for UMass W's

Ashley Gilbert scored three of UMass' four total goals over the weekend

Frosh Gilbert nets trifecta of weekend goals

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts Head Coach Patty Shea had been saying the same thing after every Maroon and White loss.

"You can't look at the end result," the UMass mentor explained earlier in the season. "Our goal has always been the conference because that is the way of getting into the NCAA tournament."

However, as the Maroon and White struggled to a 5-7 out-of-conference record to open up the year, it looked like the "process" Shea always talked about was not going as planned.

UMass	2
West Chester	0

LaSalle	1

Quite simply, it looked like Shea was trying to make excuses for why her team was struggling so badly.

Well, after the Minutewomen spent the weekend beating up on conference rivals LaSalle (2-1 on Saturday) and West Chester (2-0 on Sunday) it appears that Shea actually knew what she was talking about all along.

Which shouldn't really come as much of a surprise, due to the fact that Shea has been named A-10 coach of the year the past two seasons.

"Everyone played their part and it was a great weekend," goalie Ashley Egland said. "We are finally starting to click together again."

On Friday, the contest got off to an ominous start for the Maroon and White when LaSalle's Laura Whitman opened up the scoring with 16:29 remaining in the first half.

In the second half, however, UMass finally responded with just over 20 minutes left. Freshman Heather Kenney took a pass from leading scorer Anke Bruemmer on a penalty corner and drilled it into the net for her second tally of the year.

This score ignited an offensive explosion for the freshmen class that would not end until the weekend had finished. By the end of the weekend the rookies had tallied four goals, while their older counterparts had failed to knock a single shot into the back of the cage.

The game-winner against the Explorers came with 9:50 left when Ashley Gilbert provided an unassisted goal. With the loss, LaSalle sunk to a lowly 2-10 (0-1 A-10) on the year, while the Minutewomen simultaneously avoided what would have been a catastrophic loss for their postseason chances.

"Ashley [Gilbert] did a fabulous job," Egland said. "I always tell her to hit the ball against the other team the way she hits it at me in practice and this weekend she did just that."

Unfortunately for West Chester, Gilbert's score would only be a sign of things to come. Against the Golden Rams on Sunday, the Turner, Maine native opened up the scoring just over seven minutes in by taking a pass from Stacey Blue and beating the West Chester goaltender.

The rest of the first frame would remain scoreless, but in the second half, Gilbert struck once again by netting her fourth tally of the season. Down 2-0, the Golden Rams would never recover, and fell to 7-6 (1-1 A-10) on the season.

"I think I adjusted well to the grass," the freshman forward said (both games took place on grass and not turf). "And I feel more confident working with the other forwards. With our forward pressing we are not hesitating as much."

Gilbert's play notwithstanding, the rest of the credit for victory must be given to goalie Egland, who continued her stellar play of late by having her best weekend ever as a collegiate athlete.

Against the Explorers, Egland stopped six shots and made sure that LaSalle would not come back to tie the game once Gilbert gave UMass the lead. The next day, she absolutely shut down the Golden Rams, single handedly keeping her team ahead.

In the second frame, West Chester outshot the Maroon and White 23-3, but failed to get a ball by the sophomore netkeeper. By game's end, Egland had a career-high 15 saves as well as her first collegiate shutout.

"They're trusting me and I'm trusting them," the sophomore goalie said about her defense. "It is tough at the beginning of the season because I didn't know how they played and they didn't know how I played. Now, we have adjusted to each other."

UMass next returns to action this Wednesday when it hosts the University of Rhode Island for a 7 p.m. conference showdown.

"We are starting over," Gilbert said. "We look at it like we are 2-0 and not like we are 5-7. Now everything relates to the conference and we are still the team to beat."

Minutemen double up

Streaking UMass tops A-10 Dukes and Bonnies

By Glen Straub

This weekend Massachusetts enjoyed its annual homecoming. Mid-night madness on Friday night a Saturday afternoon football game and the hockey season opener that night were some of the staples of the UMass weekend.

Hundreds of miles away in New York and Pittsburgh, far from the festivities and the attention of the student body and alumni, the UMass men's soccer team had its own personal joy as it swept a two game road trip versus Atlantic 10 foe St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

Friday, the Minutemen pulled off a late game comeback and ground out a 3-2 victory over the Bonnies in St. Bonaventure. Two days later in Pittsburgh, the Maroon and White defeated the Dukes 2-1.

UMass	3
St. Bonaventure	2

UMass	2
Duquesne	1

Against SBU, juniors Jeff Deren and Dan Colwell scored 43 seconds apart from each other in the 77th minute, en route to the Minutemen's third victory in a row.

The score was tied at one for most of the match until St. Bonaventure's Jamal Cameron fired a shot past UMass goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn in the 75th minute – giving his squad a 2-1 lead late in the match.

Two minutes later, UMass forward Colwell tied the score once again by drifting away from the Bonnie defense, braking free on the left side and putting one past the SBU goalkeeper – making the score 2-2.

The offensive hero all season long for Massachusetts has been Deren, and he came up with the game winner once again for the Maroon and White. Forty-five seconds after Colwell's goal, Deren headed a ball into the far-left corner after a scramble in front of the SBU goal.

Suddenly, UMass had regained the lead after it looked like it had lost all control of the match.

"We have shown a lot of heart this season," Deren said. "We have a young team but the seniors have really helped us out. We are a mature team that knows if we stick with the game plan we can get the job done."

After pulling out the come from behind victory over the Bonnies, the Minutemen had to re-focus on Sunday for another tough opponent, the Duquesne Dukes.

UMass got on the scoreboard first as the blistering hot Deren netted his eighth goal of the season in the 18th minute of the match.

"I have been doing the same thing all season long," Deren said of his recent play. "I do what I am supposed to do. It's nothing out of the ordinary."

The stifling defense of UMass was able to keep the Dukes from scoring in the first half. However, just eight seconds into the second period, Duquesne forward Brian McNelis scored on O'Quinn – knotting the score at one.

"Our defense has been amazing," Deren said. "We feel that if we get even a one-goal lead we have a chance to win because our defense has been so solid."

UMass did not let the DU goal worry it, as five minutes later, sophomore forward Ptah Myers scored the early game-winner – making the score 2-1. It was Myers' fourth goal of the season.

Junior Yuri Morales assisted on Myers' game-winning goal. The helper moved him to seventh all-time on the UMass single-season assist record chart with eight this season.

The victory over Duquesne gave UMass its fourth win in a row. It was also the squad's seventh win in eight games – improving its overall record to 8-3 and conference record to 4-1.

UMass now stands tied for second with the Rhode Island Rams in the Atlantic 10 standings with 12 points.

"For every year that I have been on the team we always start out like 1-3, and then turn it around," Deren said. "When it comes time to play against our conference opponents, we start racking up the important victories."

The Minutemen take a brief break from their A-10 schedule today when they face off with Siena at 3 p.m. on Totman Field.

Yuri Morales (8 assists on the year) couldn't be held scoreless in the Minutemen's two weekend victories.

Fire in Bartlett Hall

300 students evacuated

SCOTT ELDRIDGE/COLLEGIAN

A fire early in the day brought fire fighters to area in and around Bartlett Hall.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

A small electrical fire broke loose in an underground passageway leading between Bartlett Hall and Herter Hall early yesterday morning.

The fire began in a ventilation shaft beneath Bartlett Hall around 9 a.m. as a result of an overheated motor, explained Director of the UMass News Office Barbara Pitoniak.

The Amherst Fire Department, University of Massachusetts Police Department and the UMass Environmental Health and Safety Department all responded to the scene of the fire. At that time, the Amherst Fire Department was able extinguish the fire within a matter of minutes.

Pitoniak explained that a heavy, smoky odor filled the hallways of Bartlett and Herter Hall, which was noticed by students and staff, that resulted in the calling of the Amherst Fire Department.

The fire led to the evacuation of nearly 300 students and faculty from Bartlett Hall and other areas of Herter Hall, causing a brief and minor scare to University personnel.

Students and faculty were evacuated from Bartlett Hall and areas of Herter Hall and were able to exit the buildings safely without any injuries.

Medical Assistance accompanied the Amherst Fire Department to the scene and was on hand for anyone who may have needed assistance at the time of the fire.

Students and faculty were able to resume classes and work in Herter Hall fairly quickly after the fire was extinguished, Pitoniak said.

However, Bartlett Hall's power was shut off and the building was closed. All classes were cancelled until the building was reopened to all student and faculty early yesterday afternoon.

Pitoniak confirmed that the building only suffered a few minor damages that would need to be replaced by the University.

The motor and ventilation shaft are among the two major damages, as well as a few tiles along the building ceiling that suffered minor damages stated Pitoniak.

She further explained that she felt confident that the University would be repairing all the areas in Bartlett Hall affected by the fire within the near future.

The Amherst Fire Department, UMass Police Department and the University Environmental and Health Safety Department were unavailable for comment at the time of press release.

Con-Ed grads allowed to join GEO

By Bill Larkin
Collegian Staff

On Oct. 1, the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission ruled that graduate students employed by the University of Massachusetts to teach in the Division of Continuing Education (DCE) may decide whether to join the Graduate Employee Organization/United Auto Workers Local 2322 (GEO).

The commission's decision followed a two-year grassroots campaign organized by members of GEO and the Massachusetts Society of Professors/Faculty Staff Union (MSP).

"This is one of the most significant victories in GEO's 10-year history," said Benjamin Balthaser, a campaign organizer and graduate student instructor in the English department. "Our union, and the MLRC decision, is the direct result of the hundreds of activists who took part in the campaign over the past two years."

All graduate students teaching DCE credited courses whose names appear on the university's payroll period for the week ending Sept. 28 will be eligible to vote. Once UMass provides the commission's executive secretary with three copies of the election eligibility list, the MLRC will announce a date for the unionization vote.

According to Balthaser, 80 percent of the graduate students who teach in the DCE signed cards requesting to join GEO two years ago. On March 21, 2000, GEO filed a representation petition with the MLRC seeking to represent all employees teaching credited courses in the DCE.

After the MSP filed a motion with the commission on April 20, 2000 supporting the GEO's request, the university asked the MLRC to dismiss the GEO petition on April 28, 2000. UMass asserted that the DCE teachers sought by the union consisted of "casual" employees engaged in a short-term relationship with the university.

Provost officer Susan Pearson said the university defines "casual" workers as employees who work less than two times over a two-year period. "Only 33 percent of the 518 DCE graduate teachers fit into that definition for 1999 and 2000," Pearson said.

However, as the MLRC would reveal in August, only 14 percent of those students taught just DCE classes during those two years. The remaining 86 percent taught both regular and DCE courses.

"Many of the graduate students who teach in the DCE are here for six or seven years and teach dozens of courses," Edwards said. "Those courses use the same material as their daytime counterparts, giving students the same continuity."

Four years ago, UMass started offering DCE students "shadow-sections," or courses identical to regular-session classes taught by union teachers. Last spring, non-union graduate students taught "shadow-sections" in 65 percent of DCE classes. Ninety percent of graduate students employed by the DCE also teach classes within their regular departments.

UMass agreed on Jan. 29 to allow all full-time and regular part-time professional employees teaching DCE classes to join the MSP. According to Balthaser, graduate teachers constitute 80 percent of the DCE's teaching staff, while professional instructors constitute 20 percent. Following the university's decision, the MLRC conducted hearings on March 13 and 29 whether to permit a unionization election amongst DCE graduate teachers.

Balthaser said graduate teachers argued at the hearings that the same Program Director hired them for DCE and regular session work, and the

Senate election woes continue to haunt SGA

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

On Oct. 11, former Senate members Steven Castillo and Steven Morin petitioned the SGA's Elections Commission and Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders over illegalities of this year's Senate Elections.

The Judiciary case filed was a direct photocopy of last fall's Judiciary Case against the Elections Commission and former Senate Speaker Jim Eltringham. Castillo and Morin both claim that this year's Elections were once again a direct violation of Title 8, Chapter 4 of the SGA Constitution and that one Elections Commissioner was not present at every polling station at all times.

A similar case was brought forth last year, in which members of the SGA accused the Elections Commission as well as Eltringham of violating Title 8, Chapter 4 of the SGA Constitution. It claimed that one Elections Commissioner was not present at each polling station at all times as well, thus resulting in the termination of last year's Senate Elections, in which the SGA Judiciary declared them unconstitutional.

Chancellor of Elections Sam Balasiak, SGA President John Sheehan and Saunders admitted to the lack of commissioners prior to the elections, but continued with the scheduled date.

The Senate Elections passed with the seven percent of the student vote and were ratified by the Senate on Sept. 26, where members of the SGA Coordinating Council once again questioned them.

Elected Senator Bryan Thompson and Michael Taugher were two members who abstained their votes for the ratification of the elections, by explaining that they could not consciously vote "yes."

Saunders responded to the questions surrounding the legalities of this year's election by stating that the SGA was coming off a rough year, and things needed to change.

"To dem students who have been working hard on an election based on one's title is wrong," Saunders said. "Everyone is running at 110 percent, and we need to look at the realm of the situation and not dwell on what we can't change."

A month into this year's SGA Senate, members however are taking a lighter approach to the case at hand. Senate members have claimed to be surprised as well as doubtful of the future of the case.

"It's really nothing but revenge and the fact that people have nothing better to do than file frivolous charges against this year's Elections Commission," Saunders said. "Last year tons of things happened which affected the outcome of the elections, whereas this year, they did not."

Former Chair and Senator Jeff Bazydlo and former Senator Chris Carlozzi, both witnesses on behalf of the petitioner's case explained that they want the SGA to know that the same rules should apply every year.

"This case was brought forth due to the fact that there wasn't an Elections Commissioner present at every polling sight," Bazydlo said. "Last year they claimed it was the Senate's fault, and then this year nothing is said about the same situation. The same rules apply, and they can't pick and choose when they play a role in the SGA."

Bazydlo continued by explaining that the SGA is not taking action based on politics within the Executive Cabinet as well as within the Senate.

"Last year, the fact was that the Senate was not in the Executive Cabinet's favor, and this year it is," Bazydlo said. "We just hope that someone will finally step up and take

New book reports student debt reached all-time high

By Tom Ollila
Collegian Staff

A new book reports that student debt has reached an all time high and offers advice on how avoid it. Money Rules, written by author Juliette Fairley, came out on Oct. 2.

In Money Rules, Fairley explains that "more and more people in their 20s, fresh out of college, are coming to me with credit card debts of over $10,000."

In addition to Money Rules, several other articles and books have reported the increase in student debt. Eric Hoover writes in The Chronicle of Higher Education that, "largely because of credit card use and higher student-loan balances, students are graduating from college with nearly twice as much debt as a decade ago – and consumers under 25 are filing for bankruptcy in record numbers."

Also, Finaid! The SmartStudent Guide to Financial Aid. (www.finaid.com) reports that the "typical undergraduate student completes college with $16,500 in student loans."

Giving some staggering figures, Hoover reports, "According to a 2000 survey by Nellie Mae, a major student-loan provider, undergraduates carried an average credit card balance of $2,748, up from $1,879 in 1998 and more than double the average from 1993. The study also found that nearly one in three students has at least four credit cards, and that one in 10 will graduate with balances exceeding $7,000."

According to financial aid services, UMass students can easily leave school several thousands of dollars in debt. Freshmen can take loans of $2,625, sophomores $3,500, and juniors and seniors $5,500.

Taking on this debt and adding credit card debt, the causes for Fairley's statement become apparent. "Three out of five college grads return to live with mom and dad and stay there for as much as five years – leaving the home at almost 30 years of age with zero financial power or freedom," she said. While the college debts have relatively low interests, credit card bills become very difficult to overcome.

Many UMass students get cards after filling out applications for free junk as freshmen and begin a long journey in credit debt. Senior Computer Systems Engineering major Chris Carnell lamented on his credit history. "I got a card as freshman," he said, "I initially only used it to pay for bills I just didn't have the money for. For example, I took out a cash advance to pay for my phone bill. I then got a job to pay it back. Unfortunately, I started using it to take my girlfriend out for expensive meals. Before I knew it, I had exceeded my credit limit, and although I stopped using it, fees and interest kept adding up while I only made the minimum monthly payment. It wasn't until I made a lot of money over the summer that I could make a big payment and get it down to a reasonable level. As soon as it's all paid off, I'm cutting it up."

Unfortunately for Carnell and others like him, he had no good guide to help him prevent incurring such debt. Much of Fairley's book examines ways to prevent exactly such problems from occurring. Her suggestions include: "Get a job. When you work during college you learn how to prioritize...you'll be surprised how much $100 can last you when you work for it. Save up for spring break and try to pay cash. ...Holiday, birthday and spur of the moment parent cash adds up and can fund a well-need vacation. Don't mix money with roommates and significant others. university bound them by the same contract law that covered their GEO-eligible work.

"The university doesn't even bother to make separate paychecks or separate the amounts earned from the DCE and the university when instructors taught in both," Balthaser said. "If the students, the teachers, the hiring processes, and criteria are identical, how can they argue that we can't form a union?"

According to Leslie Edwards, GEO President, the union started a campaign against the university's refusal to permit a representation election for DCE graduate teachers after the MLRC concluded the March hearings without reaching a decision.

"Some teachers had to take two to three jobs because their pay is so low," Edwards said. While GEO members who work 20 hours a week can receive a tuition waiver, a $10,800 stipend, and health and child care during the academic year, the university only provides DCE graduate teachers with a $4,800 stipend.

On July 18, at the end of this year's first academic summer session, 48 DCE graduate teachers turned in their grades five hours late, in signed and sealed envelopes stamped "graded by GEO labor," Edwards said.

According to Edwards, the university responded to the grade delay by invoking the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA), demanding the DCE teachers hand each grade one-by-one and call the scores in to the university.

"Their actions turned a five-hour grade delay into a two week stall," Edwards said. In addition, UMass "violated the law they brought against us by asking for the grades over the phone."

In mid-August, the university accused GEO of instigating a "sick out" on Aug. 16 and 17, when eight DCE graduate teachers stayed home from their classes. They filed strike charges with the MLRC against GEO, citing the illegality of a public employee strike.

Although the commission ruled against UMass, the university docked a day's pay from the accused teachers. In addition, Pearson threatened to blacklist the eight instructors who called in sick, Edwards said.

While the Provost office "has nothing to do with teaching appointments," Pearson said she told the graduate students the DCE "may examine the reliability of future hires."

At the end of the summer, "something had to happen," Edwards said. Therefore, with the support of MSP, GEO planned a boycott in which graduate instructors in five academic departments would refuse to apply for winter and spring courses that offer multiple sections of DCE classes, necessitating their cancellation.

"Graduate Program Directors (GPD) in the five departments decided against publishing some classes in the course catalog," Edwards said. "We hoped our boycott would initiate a student boycott, closing down the DCE."

Members of the boycott were planning a joint press conference with the GEO to announce their plans when they learned that the MLRC had intervened by approving the election.

"When Kevin Aiken, the Director of the DCE, asked us what's going on, we knew that word about the boycott had reached the university, but we didn't expect action so soon," Edwards said.

The MLRC concluded that "the graduate students who teach DCE credit courses have a community of interest with the existing bargaining unit of graduate students represented by the union, and that the reason for their exclusion no longer exists."

Following the verdict, the university "will adhere to the commission's decision, and not interfere with the upcoming election," Pearson said. "All along, we wanted the court to decide what the DCE should do."

According to Josh Mason, GEO Treasurer-Secretary, the DCE graduate teachers will join the University of Massachusetts-Boston as the only groups of represented DCE graduate employees within the UMass system if they vote to unionize. The GEO at UMass Boston won recognition for DCE graduate teachers in July.

responsibility for these violations."

Senate members responded to the allegations by stating that they view the case as a joke.

"The Judiciary Case is the same case as last year with a little bit more added, and any case it may be thrown out," Chair of Public Policy and Relations Michael Whitehouse said. "But it's basically being viewed as a joke by a lot of people."

Taugher expressed a different view however, by expressing that he feels that the petitioners are addressing a valid point.

"I kind of begs a question to the SGA leadership by bringing up a valid point, and I'll be interested to see what they do," Taugher said.

Attorney General Mike Martin, who was a former witness on last year's Judiciary hearing, and a main respondent to the case, explained the need to review the case before making any final decisions.

"I think they have a point, but I want to do what is in the best interest for the student body," Martin said. "And to be honest I just received the case and it's something that I'm really going to have to review before any further decisions are made."

The SGA Judiciary has seven days to review the case in which they must notify the petitioners as to whether or not the case is moving to trial. If the Judiciary committee fails to respond, the case is therefore dropped.

Members of the Senate will be meeting tonight in room 168C in the Campus Center.

Quick thinking

Dangerous situations alleviated

Emergencies occur. it is simply a part of human existence. The way that groups and organizations deal with these situations however, is what is most important.

The Amherst community at large has been especially vigilant about dealing with both crime and fire, providing quick reaction time and ensuring the safety of those at the scene. Following the report of an electrical fire in Bartlett Hall yesterday morning, firefighters from UMass were on the scene immediately to help evacuate studenis and staff out of the building and to deal with the problem.

Not only did they prove to have both quick reaction times and cool heads, but they also managed to disperse information to the anxious crowd nearby.

The Amherst Fire Department also had its share of hard work when they responded to the blaze that engulfed Delta Upsilon fraternity on Oct. 3, forcing 23 fraternity brothers to find new accommodations. Amherst Fire chief Keith Hoyle was quoted in a previous Collegian story explaining that the department did not get to the fire as fast as they would have liked, due to the fact that the fire alarms had been covered up with plastic bags.

Because they were unable to get the signal, by the time that the fire fighters responded the fire was already out of control and had devoured one side of the house. Despite that, the 45 employees from the department, joined by UMass student volunteers and four fire fighters from Northampton acted quickly and managed to have the situation under control within an hour of responding. Although four people were hospitalized with minor injuries and dehydration, the department fought the blaze until it was out. At the same time, they also managed to control a large crowd of onlookers and obtain information from the fraternity brothers regarding the fire itself.

The University was also quick to respond to the situation, dispensing food and clothing vouchers and making housing arrangements for the members of the fraternity.

What could have been a really difficult situation was alleviated by a number of people working together to be sure that everything was properly handled.

Often when emergencies occur they leave people shocked or unsure of what to do. That is why a quick and effective system, such as the effective response procedures that the employees of the UMass police and fire systems and those of Amherst, are so important. By doing their jobs effectively they not only manage to deal with preventing tragedies but they also provide concerned people with peace of mind.

And that is something that everyone could use in an emergency.

Intramural Gladiator

SAM WILKINSON

Ever seen that ESPN Classic show with John McEnroe when he sort of shrugs his shoulders and says, "I guess I have a problem with my anger?" All I'm saying is this: if they ever make Sportscentury and Beyonds about intramural football, that'll be me sitting there, shrugging my shoulders and saying "I guess I have a problem with my anger."

I was suspended for tomorrow night's game. I admit this. Last week, I threw a ball at a kid twice who was gloating about his amazing, superior and altogether unbelievable intramural athletic ability. I had already been riding the referees, who had specifically taken my team aside at the beginning of the game and said "no contact at all," and then let most contact go, as long as it was the other team doing the contacting. The exchanges went something like this.

Contact.

Me: "Hey ref, didn't you specifically say no contact today?"

Ref: "Well yeah, but it's allowed on that type of play."

Me: "Jesus Christ, do you suck."

Anyways, after a ball of this, and markedly bad play by me, I was none too amused when the referees started making more and more horrendous calls that conveniently went against our team, every single time. And then the gloating and the bragging and the "I'm the single-greatest intramural stud of a football player who ever played on the ball-owed fields next to the Mullins Center." So I threw a football at him. Twice. And pushed him a little bit. Probably mouthed off as well. Definitely mentioned my thoughts about him. Other than that however. I didn't do anything that had warranted a suspension. Ok, I definitely threw a t-shirt at the referee after the game, and asked the line judge just how many times he'd played Madden 2001 on Playstation 2 before they gave him a whistle.

So before passing any more judgment on these particular referees – one of them was the kind of guy who plays a lot of Magic in private but doesn't admit it on the off-chance that a fraternity somewhere is going to invite him to a party – allow me to say the following about my athletic career. It has been marginal at best. I've played for five championship teams (two soccer, and three baseball) and otherwise, I've played for total losers. I had a baseball team go 5-22. I had a soccer team go 0-5-2. I've experienced, I would dare say, far more defeat than I have victory.

My intramural career has been even worse. I've won three games: my first softball game, the only flag football game of my freshman year, and a volleyball game last year. Oh, a forfeit a few weeks ago when the "Newman Knights" (as if that isn't the most Crusade-sounding name they could have picked) didn't show up to face the "Basement Dwellers." Otherwise, through six intramural "seasons," I've never won. There is an intramural team (with their own website and game recaps!) called the Basses that has never won, ever, so I guess I'm not the worst off. But in losing so much, it feels like it.

However, while losing, I've come to expect a certain amount of respect from opponents. I don't show up and accept a loss. I don't lollygag around the field, being depressed that I'm about to lose. I play hard. I won't mouth off if I score a touchdown; I won't go crazy if I win a game. That doesn't seem like a standard that would be so tough for opponents to live up to. Unfortunately, some don't. And that brings out the other side of me. Shall we say, I have a tendency, when possible, to bend the rules. I also will play extra physical, and it is likely, especially if the opponents are being especially arrogant, that I will start to run my mouth. And I don't stop running my mouth. Rarely is my concern what I'm saying. Should I retake the lead, the jawing will stop. Winning is satisfactory in it of itself; I certainly don't need to gloat to feel good about victory.

These seem like rules that are practical enough.

1. In winning do not gloat. It is satisfying enough to simply win.

2. In losing, don't complain. This does not apply if:

3. The other team consists of jerks. At this point, cheat to win.

It seems this is applicable to the real world. I'm not one to moralize for others, but in doing something well, why gloat? If not doing something well, accept it and attempt to rectify the situation. This only isn't true when the situation is being partially affected by jerks.

For instance: I have friends who had a couch. It belonged to a former roommate who moved out. The former roommate said, "you can have the couch." The current friends asked, "are you absolutely sure we can have this couch?" The former roommate said, "I am absolutely sure." So the friends threw out their other couch – there isn't enough room in Alpine Commons for multiple couches – and enjoyed the new couch. Until the former roommate made a stunning return, saying that she was back to pick up the couch.

My friends should have fought harder to keep the couch; but they are nice people, so nobody really told the former roommate that she'd given them the couch so it was no longer hers. And the former roommate got the couch. My friends have put cushions on a coffee table and are currently using that as their couch. It is the saddest thing of all time.

Which leads me back to my intramural suspension. Some could argue that, "No, Sam, getting suspended is the saddest thing of all time, not the loss of your friend's couch." Those people are wrong. The fact is that, as guys who go out and play sports, we shouldn't have to tolerate the asinine behavior of our opposition. I feel bad that I responded the way I did, but if the referees will go unpunished by the intramural office for their unbelievable lack of skill when it comes to "knowing anything about football," and if the other team will go unpunished for "gloating like cram," why should I go punished for standing up for myself? I'd rather be suspended pointing out the obvious than lose, accepting the painful. Meanwhile, the season is over and unfortunately, my team isn't going to make the playoffs so my retirement from intramural football is complete. Which means this column is over.

Or is it?

My friends still don't have a couch. Do you have one? Do you have a couch you're trying to get rid of? If it's not beer-stained, my friends will take it. Please feel free to send an email to alpinecouch@hotmail.com. I'm serious. You have no idea how hard it is to look at my friends, sitting on cushions on a coffee table, privately hoping that it might actually be a couch.

The important decision between right and wrong
What will you do when it's time to make a judgement?

ADAM BIALEK

There are roughly 24 million people who live in Afghanistan. Let us assume that roughly half are women. Half must adhere to the five under strict Islamic law and there are countless accounts of domestic abuse and murder. Also, I would like to point out that men too live under strict Islamic law. The government consists of a group called the Taliban. The government is a dictatorship. The people fought and suffered through a long and painful war against the Soviet Union. The countryside is riddled with land mines. People are starving, suffering from disease and have little to no education.

There are countless other facts that I can point to that may enlighten citizens of our country as to what an accurate picture of Afghanistan is. Truth be told, I could never paint you an accurate picture of Afghanistan without going there. I don't know anything about the people who live there. Their concerns, strife, pain, culture, collective history, desires, values – I know next to nothing about them or their country.

I do know we have bombed them because their government won't hand over a man named Osama bin Laden. I also know that the mainstream media of my country leaves me with thousands of unanswered questions. I suspect they only want me to watch more of their station so they will make more money. I know my government won't offer up any evidence indicating if Osama bin Laden is guilty of, linked to or responsible for the terrible atrocity on September 11th. This want me to take their word for it. I feel like I am generally well informed and well read on various political issues. I pay attention to the news, read a lot and am concerned about what happens in the world. Yet I am profoundly confused as to what is going on in the world right now.

I know that it was extremely painful when a family friend died in one of the planes that violently crashed into the World Trade Center. I know his children will miss him. I know their lives will never be the same. I know that was one of the saddest and most painful days of my life. I know that thousands and millions of American felt that same pain. I know. I don't want people to feel that ever again.

I don't know why we have waited to send humanitarian aid to the starving masses of Afghanistan until we are also bombing them. I don't know why. I haven't thought that we should send humanitarian aid to all people who need it in the entire world. Starting with our country. Do I need more useless crap or do people need to eat and get vaccinated from known diseases? Are we really that shallow? It really is as simple as that.

I am starting to become increasingly enraged at the Bush administration for putting our world in danger and not getting the point. God is not on our side. Allah is not on their side. This is not about them being evil and us being good. This is not about the U.S. being evil and Afghanistan being good. This is about manipulation, terror, power, political longevity, ignorance, suppression, misconstrued religious beliefs, pure hatred and pure evil. This is about evil versus evil. People who kill are evil. People who repress are evil. People who drop bombs on people are evil. People who don't care about anything but themselves are evil.

Our government is doing something that is evil. Does anyone else feel like they want to rip their hair out? Is launching a major air-bombing campaign against a country of peasants an act of good? If you believe in God, do you think God would approve of our actions? If you believe in Allah, do you think he would approve of their actions? If you believe in any sort of higher moral being or force that exists in the universe, do you honestly believe he, she or they would agree with anything that is happening? I am not now, nor have I ever been, a member of any organized religion. Don't use that to write me off. This is my moral argument.

"People who repress are evil. People who drop bombs on people are evil. People who don't care about anything but themselves are evil....Our government is doing something that is evil."

Afghanistan is not Osama bin Laden. The Taliban is not Afghanistan. Afghanistan consists of 24 million individuals. They do not have the privilege of living in a democracy. They are not allowed to vote, voice their opinion or get an education. We should be extending our hand to those people. If you think we are, you're wrong. Our political rhetoric is hypocritical and xenophobic. We are only repeating history. We are not forging a new way. We are not on the side of justice. We are to blame. You and me and every face you see walking down the street. We need to take action. We need to take responsibility. We need to take control of our destiny and not leave it in the hands of some crazy lunatics who are playing some sort of a chess match.

The choices you make right now are very much about right and wrong. It is about doing what your heart says is right and resisting the evil ways of vengeance, murder and war. We need to pay attention to the world we live in. This is the time to make a choice. There are many different choices to choose from. What will be your choices? Will they be humane? Will they be vengeful? Will they stop death? Will they aid in the proliferation of war and suffering around the world? Will you take everything you have for granted until you have nothing to take for granted? Will you have faith in the establishment? Or are you going to stand up and yell at the top of your lungs until people start to listen?

Lee channels Carson in A Sense of Wonder

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Actress, writer, and environmental activist Kaiulani Lee will be bringing her one-woman show, A Sense of Wonder, to Mount Holyoke's Gamble Auditorium tonight, at 7:00 p.m. In A Sense of Wonder, Lee portrays environmental author Rachel Carson.

Carson is generally credited with beginning the modern environmental movement in the 1960s with the publication of her book Silent Spring, which condemned the use of DDT and other pesticides. Her book led to the creation of a presidential commission, which supported her findings and restricted usage of environmentally harmful chemicals. She died in 1964, only two years after her book was published.

In A Sense of Wonder, Lee portrays Carson toward the end of her life, when Silent Spring has begun to receive acclaim, and she has become aware of her terminal cancer.

"Lee wrote the show," explained Jane Evans, Program Coordinator of the Center for Environmental Literacy at Mount Holyoke College. "She had access to journals and personal information. She's created a show that blends the personal and the public.

"It's quite dramatic," Evans continued. "This actress becomes Rachel Carson. It's very provocative."

The event is being sponsored by the Center for Environmental Literacy and the United States Fish and Wildlife Service. Carson herself worked for the Fish and Wildlife Service in the 1930s and 40s, as a biologist and editor.

Kathy Zeamer, the director of External Affairs for the Fish and Wildlife Service's division in Hadley, is excited about the opportunity to educate the public about Carson's life.

"It's interesting for us to be able to showcase a theatrical event that showcases a prominent environmentalist," Zeamer said. "Rachel Carson is one of our own."

Despite the enormity of Carson's contribution to the environmental field, little is mentioned of her today. This may have been due to the fact that she died before her work achieved its greatest recognition, and because she was a fairly private person.

"She was a very introspective woman," Zeamer said. "She's not one of these huge characters. She was intellectual, studious, and very much a naturalist.

"I wonder," she continued, "if it's partly because she was a woman. Women often aren't recognized [for their contributions]."

A Sense of Wonder is free, and open to the public at large. Its performance is part of a series of events planned for National Wildlife Refuge Week, and is being held in honor of the Fish and Wildlife Service's centennial anniversary in 2003.

Another event planned in honor of National Fish and Wildlife Week is Our Wild Century, a photography exhibit displayed in the Fish and Wildlife Service's Hadley office, located at 300 Westgate Center Drive, behind Staples. The exhibit features 47 photos of National Wildlife Refuges in the Northeast and Mid-Atlantic U.S.

Didion explores power of writing and politics

By Antero Garcia & Sophia Whang
Daily Bruin [U. California-Los Angeles]

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES – According to the acclaimed author Joan Didion and contrary to popular belief, politics is actually interesting.

"At first I thought politics was about stuff I just wasn't interested in," Didion said from her home in New York. "Then I started realizing it was a series of inventions or fables that were in some ways intended to draw a screen between it and me. The political process isn't intended to be in touch with the people with the electorate. As people become aware of it, it gives them the confidence to be mad."

In addition to her myriad of novels, screenplays and essays, Didion has recently finished a sixth nonfiction book, "Political Fictions."

Before writing bestsellers and even before being an editor at Vogue magazine, Didion was an avid writer as a child. But after graduating as an English major at the University of California-Berkeley, even Didion had to overcome insecurities about writing.

"It takes a long time to work the nerve back up to try to (write) yourself because it seems as if everything has already been done as well as it can be done," Didion said. "When I got out of Berkeley, I was too intimidated to try writing myself. It took a couple of years to get up the nerve to make the plunge."

As an accomplished writer, Didion has already made more than a few plunges. She has no rituals to get herself into the writing mode, but she wakes up every day with the motivation to work. She even works on weekends.

"Basically, you just have to sit at the computer or the typewriter and do it. What you gradually learn to do is not panic when it doesn't come at first," she said.

When she used to live in California, she and her husband John Gregory Dunne used to take long drives to Santa Barbara in order to overcome the panic of hitting a wall.

"I think learning to write is the process of learning not to panic, to let it kind of flow at its own speed," Didion said. "It's also a process of learning that if you hit a wall, it's usually for a reason. Something's wrong in what you're doing but you might not know exactly what it is yet."

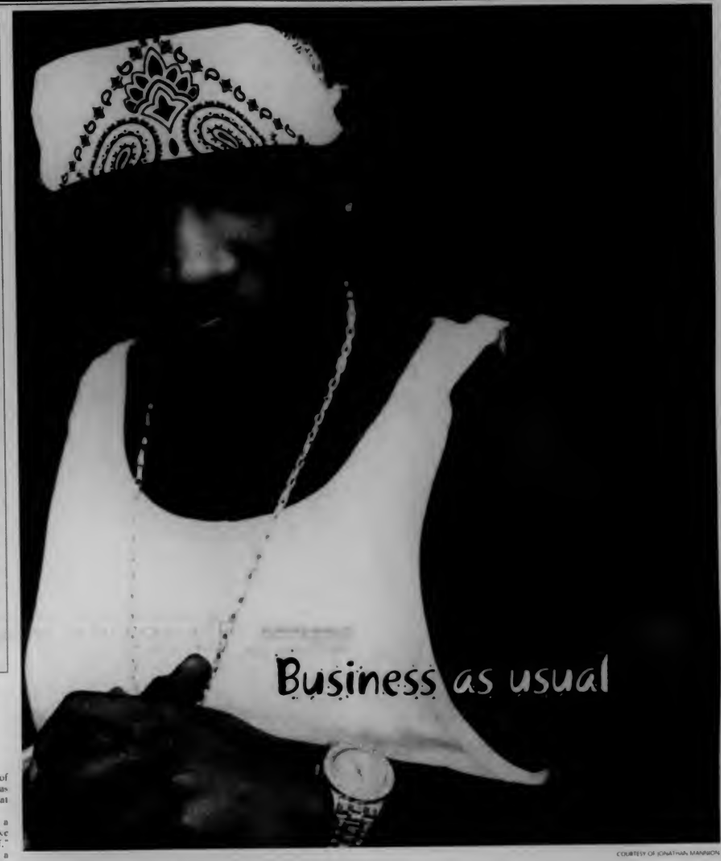
This process applies to both fiction and nonfiction writing, and Didion notes she gets equal pleasure out of writing both genres. "Democracy" was one fictional novel in particular that Didion had difficulties writing.

"Sometimes you're working on a novel that's no fun at all, like 'Democracy.' It just never took off," Didion said. "Some novels I have a good time writing. You get a real rush of energy in everything you see or hear or think about and everything just leads into the novel."

While novels seem to come together on their own, Didion feels that writing theses is much more difficult because of the required degree on analysis.

"Writing a novel is like a dream process," Didion said. "You don't plan it and you don't analyze it, it just starts coming."

Since her most recent book "Political Fictions" is not actually fiction, there was a greater degree of analysis needed than for a novel. She followed the presidential elections from 1988 to 2000, which made her skeptical about political processes.



"I got to the end of the 2000 election, and everyone was talking about Florida as if it were some kind of out-of-the-blue phenomenon that didn't have anything to do with the process," Didion said. "It seemed to me that it had everything to do with the process and it was exactly what I had been looking at since 1988. I decided to pull these various pieces together in a way that led up to Florida."

Her experiences in politics include spending a week in the White House press room in 1984, which initially made her question the media's accountability. She was surprised to find out that press conferences were a series of staged events meant to be reported in a certain circumscribed way. "I actually believed that the reporters had developed some sources and talked to them, and really been in touch," Didion said.

"No, there is a briefing every day. This is a kind of shocking thing to me because essentially what they were reporting was not stuff they had learned by actually reporting anything. It was stuff they had been told by sitting in the White House press room. They were being told the administration's story, and then they proceeded to retell it."

While she challenges political authorities and the media, it is only through writing that she is able to do

Ja Rule completely shrugs off his tired thug image for Pain Is Love.

Pain Is Love adheres to Ja formula

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

JA RULE
Pain Is Love
Def Jam

Ja Rule is the stereotypical rapper. His music (songs about hos, and ice) and his look (shirt off, thugged out) certainly won't gain him any creativity points. However, the reason he is a walking stereotype is because that stereotype has sold and earned him millions. With two platinum albums and a slew of hits under his belt, Ja Rule has become perhaps the most mainstream rapper in the game.

Whether it's his own radio friendly hits like "Put It On Me," or collaborations with others like "I'm Real," there hasn't been a time over the past year where Ja hasn't been all over MTV and radio. For his third album, Pain Is Love, (a phrase he used on "I Cry," from his last album) Ja had not one, but two, huge radio hits under his belt before the album even dropped. The summer smash "I'm Real" with Jennifer Lopez and the party pop-hop anthem "Livin' It Up" both adhere to Ja's formula of producing (with Irv Gotti's help) super-friendly radio hits that drive his album sales.

However if one expects an album full of pop hop like the singles, they came to the wrong place. The rest of the album is much more street and dreary than the single fare. The tracks feature Rule's raspy, baritone, DMX-esque voice laid over hard grinding beats, rapping about the usual: cash, money, cars, hos, cause that's what a true baller knows. Sure, it's been heard a thousand times before, but it still sounds good.

Like his last album, there are basically two kinds of songs; the thug song and the love song. This time he manages to combine the two into one, perhaps because some considered him soft after his last album that featured three "love raps" ("Put It On Me," "Between Me and You," "I Cry"). This time around when he tells the girl he likes her, he also lets them know that for him it's "money before bitches," and that "he'll fuck you like crazy, and then he's gone." In the standout track "Always On Time," Also, he might like the girl, but "bitch I ain't doin' this for nutin," In "I'm Real," where he and Lopez's voices go together like peanut butter and jelly, or better yet a DC-3 and Mountain Dew from Wings. Thug meets love again in "Down Ass Bitch." Meanwhile, thug stays thug in "Never Again," "Worldwide Gangsta," and "Smokin and Ridin," where he gives a shout out "to his nigga Vin Diesel," referring to his crossover success as a co-star in the summer hit film The Fast and Furious.

Having a slew of guest stars on a hip-hop album is nothing new, but a few of them work exceedingly well. 2pac's rhyme on "So Much Pain," an album highlight, succeeds. With purpose, 2pac states "They'll never take me alive." Meanwhile Ja spouts (fittingly with 2pac on the track), "I keep drinking Hennesses/ busting out my enemies /Will I live to see 25?" Missy Elliot's guest spot on "X" is far from memorable, but fine for what it is.

Although it's far from an ODB album, there is a touch of comedy to freshen the album midway through. The skit "Leo," about a psychic that is related to – you guessed it, daytime talk show commercial legend Miss Cleo, adds some levity.

Listening to Ja Rule, it is apparent that there is nothing particularly unique about him. With the help of the sharp production of hitmaker Irv Gotti, he churns out song after song that is well produced, but still features relatively simple beats and samples. Some of Gotti's jumps electronic-sounding beats sound cool, but still seems minor league compared to a producer like say, Timbaland. Rule's raspy voice adds to his overall sound to at least give him something unique, and it's a catchy contrast when accompanied by female vocals (four of his biggest hits use this formula).

Since it's his third album, one would expect Ja Rule to have at least something to say other than the usual hackneyed hip-hop fare. He doesn't. The closest he comes is "Lost Little Girl," a track about a pregnant 17-year-old girl. The only thing is, 2pac already had that idea 9 years ago ("Brendas Got A Baby"). The most obvious thing about his new album, and his career in general, is that Ja Rule is more interested in commercial success by producing safe material rather than taking any risks musically.

In Rule's words: "Blowing back on this Mary Jane/ I'm analyzing the game." Analyzing Ja Rule it is apparent that he recognizes he has a good thing going with his crossover, pop success. He has been successful at that, and this album will continue that trend. But aside from his success, is he any better than the countless rappers who aren't lucky enough to have Irv Gotti as a producer? Probably not, but hey, for now he might as well be livin' it up.

LENNON
5:30 Saturday Morning
Arista

Lennon Murphy has some issues. Paranoia, as suggested by the cover art depicting her topless in bed under camera surveillance? Murder fantasies, courtesy of the booklet pics of Lennon next to a suicide jumper and a bloody, facedown corpse on a bed? Pseudo-sexual/religious ravings, as in "Mommy's in the closet finding God/ I'm on my knees finding you?" Check, check and check, and while you might want to give her a hug to make her feel better, if working out her problems produces stuff as good as 5:30 Saturday Morning, it's tempting just to let her be.

Song numero uno, "Property of Goatfucker," makes it clear that Lennon is no weepy folkie, and all acoustic guitars would likely be little more than shattered wood shards in her hands. "Goatfucker's" early NIN sounding electronics and hammering Rammstein-esque riff produce the album's most aggressive sounds, but the venom behind it all flows throughout the album. In fact, with lines like "I just want to live my life/ They just want to hear they're right," "Goatfucker" feels like "Head Like A Hole" revisited.

Lennon doesn't have nearly as much a beef with the world as she does with herself and her love life, however. "Brake Of Your Car" rages against the confusion of relationships, spitting, "I'm sorry if I'm a little confused that you're leaving/ Did you ever think that was the wrong thing to do?" In the end, the impression is left that Lennon is being way too hard on herself. A good number of the tracks come fully equipped with soaring choruses and a headfirst beat that speak of hope rather than wallowing, but when she tickles the ivories or calls for some eerie keyboard effects, you wish she would just love herself and make the confident, radiant record she certainly has in her. Turn that frown upside down, Lennon. (Michael Delano)

DAVID GARZA
Overdub
Atlantic

To put it lightly, it made me nauseous. The lyrics of David Garza's self-produced album Overdub were played out and every song sounded strangely like the previous one. As I was listening to each wonderful turn, I kept wondering if I could hold out until the end of the CD. He had this awful habit of repeating the same phrase over and over and over; until I would have rather played Russian roulette with a loaded gun than be subjected to further auditory abuse. At least I could sing along on my first time listening to it, not that I wanted to. I suggest everyone listen to this masterpiece so they can experience the "magic" for themselves. I thought for a second it may have been a joke, but when I realized he was serious it was even funnier.

If I had to categorize this music, which is in actuality in a class of its own, I would say it was pop rock. It reminded me of an extremely annoying and serious version of Sugar Ray. The songs ranged from really upbeat at the beginning of the album to slow, sad and relaxed at the end. The beats weren't actually that bad, but his voice and those hopelessly trite lyrics murdered and buried any hope of digging these jams. To wrap up this record bashing session I will leave you with the word of David Garza himself. "Used to get jacked up on coffee, used to say hello what's up, used to count prime numbers from the bottom up." Apparently he was a natural poet in kindergarten. (Deirdra Frum)

RABIES CASTE
Let the Soul Out and Cut the Vein
Earache

This album is a lot like navigating a dense jungle. It can be downright boring at times, as the scenery changes very little. But it can also be strangely beautiful, by just the sheer overpowering presence of nature that allows the appreciation of the little things in contrast to the jungle's vastness. Keep in mind, however, that your tour guides for this expedition are three metalheads from Jerusalem who supplement their massive sludge-metal with droning, distorted screams. So if you're not a fan of the Godflesh, Neurosis, Crowbar or their ilk, don't even bother investing in the bug spray.

The vocals/guitar of David K., bass of Russell Bear, and drums of Dale Rabid are nearly inseparable much of the time, they all come at you like one big metal mass. It's impenetrable much of the time, but there are small flourishes along the way that really stand out. Rabies Caste pays a lot more attention to groove than some of their peers as well, giving the album a deep and crawling flow, rather than a monotone ticket to boredom. This is a mood record, though, from beginning to end, and if you have the itch for something slow and bludgeoning, Let the Soul Out And Cut the Vein is a very solid pick. And don't be alarmed when they hit what is a bouncy and, daresay danceable rhythm on "Hand Abortion." Hell hasn't frozen over, it's just the band spreading their wings, hopefully something we'll see more of in the future. (Michael Delanol

It hurts me to say this, but Reveille: hardcore.

It hurts me because they're too pretty to be in a metal band. The singer looks like he should be in a J. Crew ad, and the guitarist looks like Hanson. It also hurts me because they're from Chelmsford, from whence nothing hardcore has ever come. It hurts me that they dodged the label of "Boston band" and moved to New York, and the picture of Hanson wearing a Yankees hat causes me no little pain. It hurts me because the cover art and packaging are atrocious - a so.

"Writing is like an act of aggression. I'm not a very aggressive person personally, but I tend to be more aggressive when I sit down with a piece of paper in front of me," Didion said. A part of her philosophy on aggressive writing is the ability to change people's perspectives on her subjects.

"You hope you can change people's perspectives. There is that line of W.H. Auden's – 'Poetry makes nothing happen.' Sometimes I feel writing makes nothing happen but you keep nagging and hoping it will."

gradually decaying orange being picked apart by dental tools. And, last but not least, it hurts me because there are times when vocalist Drew Simollardes sounds exactly like "The Way I Am"-style Eminem.

However, facts cannot be argued with, and the fact is that bleed the sky is one hardcore piece of metal.

"Unborn," the first song, has points where it could be the guys from Shadows Fall playing guitar. Single "What You Got" is short, fast and mean, and refuses to get out of your head. "Down to None" is Simollardes rapping over nothing more than a drumbeat and organ sample reminiscent of Biohazard's "Waiting to Die"), and it goddamn works better than anyone could have expected it to. "Modified Lie" has a cool name. "Bleeding out in my own idolatry for you, my adoration dripping drop by drop" is a great lyric. These are simply sad facts that force me to recommend the Reveille album to my friends and neighbors, something I never thought that I would be forced to do.

In the end, the music speaks louder than any of the negative things about this shameful pathetic band that has dared to release a really good album. Or, as the band puts it, "Denial still rings in these lifeless eyes." (Rob Schulze)

Week 5 brings controversy

The NFL has completed week five and there is celebration in one city: the Dallas Cowboys have won a game. Granted, it was the worst game in Monday Night Football history, but the Cowboys scored more points than their opponent, the Washington Redskins. Oh yeah, other things happened this week and too.

Even though the New York Giants lost in St. Louis, they made their presence as a serious contender to get back to the Super Bowl felt. With Kurt Warner at quarterback the Rams were averaging 40 points per game at home over his career going into Sunday's battle. However, the Giants held the Rams to just 15, while making Warner and especially Marshall Faulk look human. Faulk, the reigning MVP last season had just seven carries for 25 yards with two fumbles and one injured knee.

Warner was hounded all day by the Giants defensive line, in particular the one man wrecking crew known as Michael Strahan. Strahan had four sacks and established himself as the most dominant defensive lineman in the NFL.

However, the problem with the Giants is and always has been their offense. Kerry Collins and the league's low-powered attack have brought the effectiveness of the Giants defense New York's D has played well enough to be 4-1, but their success has left them hanging on by a thread.

The Giants and Rams are still contenders on the road to the Super Bowl, but as of right now, if I am to pick the Giants and Rams, I do not want to run into the Green Bay Packers. Brett Favre was at his best on Sunday against the top defense in the league of the Baltimore Ravens, carrying them up for 27 completions in 34 attempts with three touchdowns. Favre, with a healthy Antonio Freeman, a running game in Ahman Green and a stifling defense is the most dangerous quarterback in the NFL because he can take those chances.

As for the Ravens, this was a game in which even mediocre efforts by the defense Ray Lewis and the rest of the Raven defense have been use to dominating teams with their stingy aggressive style of play. However, they were the ones being dominated. The Packers were not afraid to take chances on offense and play to the only way you can play against this defense.

Speaking of taking chances, Mike Holmgren is about to take a very calculated gamble. His Seahawks have won two games in a row. The offense has looked crisp with Trent Dilfer and Shaun Alexander in the backfield. However, he is going to go Dilfer back on the bench and re-insert Matt Hasselbeck as the quarterback in two weeks. Let me compare the two. Dilfer: has won his last 13 starts. Hasselbeck: has been lucky to have completed more than 15 passes this season. Dilfer: no turnovers. Hasselbeck: making people in Seattle rollover. This is just because of the fact that Holmgren traded for Hasselbeck. There is no other reason why Hasselbeck should be starting. Holmgren is trying to save face, but it is not for the betterment of the team and he will find that out when Hasselbeck comes back.

Speaking of potential quarterback controversies, I can already tell that the fans are going to make one out of the New England Patriots' situation. Drew Bledsoe is not expected back for at least a couple of weeks, if he even comes back this year at all.

DR. DAVID ROSE

Backup Tom Brady just completed 33 passes for 364 yards as he rallied his team from 10 points down in the final six minutes to defeat the San Diego Chargers.

Patriot fans have been waiting for any opportunity to try and run Bledsoe out of town, whether it be through bad play, or in this case, an injury. With Brady going as well as he has, the fans are rallying around Brady as their new captain come back.

I am now going to try and reason with all those Patriot fans that want to get rid of Bledsoe. Here goes how stupid are you? Your best running back the last two years has been Kevin Faulk. WHAT? Where's Marion Butts when you need him? Bledsoe does not have the talent around him to get the job done. Bledsoe led this team to a Super Bowl and has been disrespected ever since he got there.

Yes, Brady did lead them to a comeback win, but I still do not trust the Chargers on the road and the fact that the Lightning Bolt turned into the usually Vanilla Bland Tampa Bay Buccaneers in the fourth quarter did not help matter. Bledsoe is your quarterback. Learn to deal with it.

Speaking of the Bucs, they left the blandness that then offense had been the first four weeks of the season and actually threw the ball downfield. They put 28 points on the board. However, it figures that the one week the offense decides to go all out, the defense decides to show up. The defense was expect at best, giving up a season high 31 points in an overtime loss to the Titans. Brad Johnson had his first three touchdown passes of the year and Keyshawn Johnson had 140 yards receiving.

Even though the Bucs lost the fact that the offense exploded like it did is a great sign for them for the remainder of the campaign.

Now we go to the picks and if we were going by straight game results, I would have been 3-1 last week. Unfortunately, that is not the way it goes with me. I pick on point spreads, thus leaving me at 1-2-1 last week and 2-3-1 for the year. Once again I will go with the fearsome foursome this week.

The Ravens are coming off a humiliating loss in Green Bay, Cleveland is coming off a tough loss at the Bengals. The Ravens are favored by seven points. The Ravens are angry. The Browns will be the sacrificial lambs. The Ravens will eat the Browns up for breakfast lunch and dinner. Even though it is in Cleveland, take the Ravens.

The New England Patriots travel to Indianapolis to take on the Colts. The Pats are coming off a win at home, while the Colts are coming off a second straight loss to Oakland. Peyton Manning has thrown nine interceptions through four games this year. This game, being in Indianapolis makes the Colts a 10 1/2 point favorite. However, those who think the Colts will take out their frustrations out on the Pats' back at the last two games, these two teams have played in Indy. Both of them were Colt victories by scores of 21-18 and 30-25. The Colts will end their losing streak but take the Pats with the point.

Green Bay travels to Minnesota to take on the Vikings. The Packers go into the game as three and a half point favorites on the road. I said earlier in the article that the Packers are probably the most dangerous team in the league right now. However, the Vikings at the Metrodome are their kryptonite. Randy Moss always seems to play his best games against the Packers. Brett Favre has just one touchdown this season and is due to breakout. It will probably be a field goal game but take Moss over getting the 3 1/2 at home.

Finally on Monday night, the Giants host the Eagles. The Giants are coming off a loss last week that probably disappointing earned them a bit of respect around the league. The Eagles are coming off a loss two weeks ago to Arizona that also disappointing gave some NFL fans hindsight by the fact that they lost to Arizona. The Giants always have their number. The Eagles have lost nine straight to the Giants. Make it 10. The Giants always have their number. The Eagles have lost nine straight to the Giants. Make it 10. The Giants always have their number. The Eagles have lost nine straight to the Giants. Make it 10.

LSU settles discrimination suit

By Heidi Cenac
The Reveille (Louisiana State U.)

(U-WIRE) BATON ROUGE, La. – Five former Louisiana State University athletes will receive $37,500 each from Wednesday's settlement of a 7-year-old sexual discrimination lawsuit against the University.

The five students sued the University, claiming the LSU Athletic Department procrastinated starting women's varsity soccer and softball teams and did not provide equal treatment to female athletes.

According to court documents, former Athletic Director Joe Dean allegedly referred to one of the women as "honey," "sweetie," and "cutie" in a meeting about starting a soccer team and said the University should consider their request because the players "would look cute running around in their soccer shorts."

Dean retired after the spring 2000 semester.

In Feb. 2000, a court of appeals ruled the University violated Title IX, a federal law that states that no person should be excluded from any federally funded program or activity on the basis of gender.

As part of the settlement, the University also will pay more than $1 million to the two law firms representing the students. The attorney for the plaintiffs, Nancy Baluse, could not be reached before press time.

The payment is a compromise based on a mandate by the federal court after a trial case in 1996. The University's insurance administered through the Office of Risk Management, will pay the settlement, according to LSU attorneys.

The settlement is not an admission of liability on the part of the University, but is a compromise to avoid further litigation, said David Bienvenu, an attorneys for the University.

"Litigation is expensive, uncertain," he said. "Enough litigation had taken place, and the parties wanted to move forward."

The settlement requires the plaintiffs dismiss the lawsuit and any future claims against the University related to the case.

However, the plaintiffs can seek judicial enforcement if LSU's commitment to women's athletics and the University can contest attempts if they are deemed unwarranted.

"We are pleased the University and the plaintiffs were able to find some common ground in this case and settle the suit in an amicable fashion," said Chancellor Mark Emmert in a statement Wednesday. "The University has made some significant strides in supporting women's athletics during the past decade, and everyone connected to LSU is proud of the successes of all the University's sports, both men's and women's."

Chancellor Emmert was out of town Monday and could not provide further comment. However, Provost Daniel Fogel said the University's main concern is moving forward.

"It appears to be a reasonable settlement, and we are focused on moving forward," he said.

One of the changes since the lawsuit was the formation of a senior women's administrator position to oversee the progress and direction of women's athletics.

Judy Southard, who serves as associate athletic director and senior women's administrator, said the position also is a liaison between LSU women's athletics and the NCAA.

"I think over time the University posture has changed dramatically and the provisions necessary to run a top notch women's athletic program," she said.

Southard said recent successes of the women's teams show the University's commitment to women's sports.

For example, since its creation in 1997, the LSU softball team won five SEC division titles, three SEC championships, two SEC tournament titles and third place at the NCAA College World Series.

Athletic Director Skip Bertman said he is glad to see the lawsuit close. "I'm glad it's behind us. Of late, we've been of pretty good compliance of Title IX."

The University hires government consultants to come to the campus for two to three weeks and interview coaches and administrators to give them advice on what they can do to improve the school's compliance efforts, Bertman said.

Bertman said LSU has changed since the lawsuit was filed in 1994, and he would not expect a lawsuit of this type at the University now.

"Naturally, nobody should be discriminated against in any sense," he said. "From what I can see, all the ladies are satisfied."

The plaintiffs of the lawsuit were unable to be reached.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

UMass' attack missed the play of Lymarie Llovet yesterday. The team's top digger will miss the next few matches with a severe ankle sprain.

saints

"He's good with the ball and he did some really nice things today," Koch said of his budding star. "He's not in 100% game shape but when he is, he is going to be a spectacular player and help us out a lot."

The Minutemen got on the board first when senior defender Shawn Green scored his second goal of the season in 25th minute.

Off of a corner kick on the right side of the Siena zone, the Marshfield native received the ball on the left side of the net and attempted to score on the Saints goalkeeper but was denied by Hicks. He recovered the rebound, gave it another try and placed it to the right of the diving netminder and scored.

Siena countered in the same fashion just five minutes later. On a corner kick in the UMass zone, Saints forward Paul Ciovacco took two chances on Minutemen goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn and scored. Freshman Brent Plumley bailed out his out-of-position goalie and stopped Ciovacco's initial shot in front of the UMass net.

After Burrell gave UMass the lead going into the second period, it took the Maroon and White forty-eight minutes to score again.

The consistent Minuteman defense held down the fort in the second half. Co-captain Pouncey played an excellent game in his usual role as sweeper as he deflected many balls from entering the presence of O'Quinn.

"He has always been a solid player," Koch said.

In the 58th minute, O'Quinn contributed the stifling defense when he made an amazing save on Siena forward Kevin Purcell. A ball that looked to be placed above the reach of O'Quinn was smacked away when he dived to the right and punch the ball out of play displaying his immense ability.

Finally in 83rd minute, the Minutemen were able to score again – giving them the necessary insurance goal. The culprit was, not surprisingly, the Maroon and White's leading scorer, Jeff Deren.

Four minutes later after a miscommunication in the UMass box, Siena was able to loft a ball into the net, making the score 3-2.

"We were kind of sloppy giving up those two goals," Koch said.

Despite showing some inauspicious play, UMass was able to pull out the victory.

"We did enough to win," Koch said. "Siena is always coming to play at you for 90 minutes and it was a battle today.

"I wish we played better, but I am pleased," he added.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Senior midfielder Max Woll and Co. did enough to get the win at Totman Field.

22. Small threw down seven kills in the game alone, while Vander Veen contributed five. The home team also finished with an astounding .486 hitting percentage for the game, slamming down 20 kills to the Cage floor while committing only three errors.

Kenny couldn't explain her team's consistent struggle in the first two games, and said she had little to do with UMass' offensive firepower coming out of the locker room.

"I wish I could take credit, but I really didn't have anything to say to fire them up," Kenny said.

In game four, however, the Minutewomen could not overcome the potent Harvard offense, as the Crimson turned a 9-10 lead into a 9-15 advantage as the Minutewomen began to unravel and commit several errors. The Crimson kept the pressure on consistently, never letting UMass come within five points as they closed out the match with a 30-22 victory.

Small and DeMarte led the Maroon and White attack, finishing with 19 kills apiece. Vander Veen chipped in with 15 finishes, and Stehnova ended with 57 assists from the setter position.

Although UMass ended leading in most statistical categories, Kenny simply said, "We got beat.

"We just had way too many service errors; every time we got on a roll, we missed a serve," she added.

With the loss, the Maroon and White fell to 9-8 overall, with a record of 3-5 in the Atlantic 10. Fading in the postseason picture, and with conference powerhouse Temple looming this Friday, the Minutewomen are looking to get back on track in the conference race. However, Kenny doesn't think that her squad was worrying more about Temple than its Ivy League opponent.

"We're just not good enough of a team that we can overlook anybody," she said.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Coach Bonnie Kenny (not pictured) admitted that her team had too many service errors to be succesful yesterday.

S.W. Texas move to Div. 1-A not based on stadium expansion

By Johnny Lewis
The Daily University Star (Southwest Texas State U.)

(U-WIRE) SAN MARCOS, Texas – A $10 million proposed expansion of Bobcat Stadium is not a requirement for Division I-A football, but an "if-all-else-fails" contingency plan in case the Southwest Texas State athletic department falls short in its effort to sell discounted season tickets.

According to "The Business Plan to Move to Division I-A," if the athletic department failed to sell enough tickets to meet the NCAA's fundamental attendance requirements, then in 2005 the stadium would double to 30,000 seats to qualify for easier attendance criteria. "The Business Plan" was presented to the Texas State University System Board of Regents by SWT as a condition of the board's support for an expanded football program.

The NCAA currently requires ticket sales of 17,000 per game for four years. However, if an institution has a 30,000-seat stadium, it only has to meet the ticket sale requirements for one year.

"That's true," SWT President Jerome Supple said of the fact that the stadium expansion was not tied to increased fan support.

The current rules of the NCAA create a paradox in that potential Division I-A schools with difficulties getting fans into their stadiums are given incentive to expand those stadiums to qualify for attendance rules that are not as stringent, according to Jim Wacker, special assistant to the president for athletic projects.

Wacker said SWT would not expand the stadium unless there was a need.

James Studer, vice president for Student Affairs, said the $10 million stadium expansion was no longer good business because the new rules will not give special consideration to schools with such large stadiums.

"If you notice, in the new rules, there is not a mention of the 30,000," Studer said. "It would be stupid of us to build a 30,000-seat stadium."

Bobcat football can enter Division I-A under the current rules by expanding the stadium, but after the new rules take effect, SWT will be held to new criteria likely to require 15,000 in average actual attendance, regardless of stadium size.

According to Supple, the athletic department will compensate for insufficient ticket sales by doubling the size of Bobcat Stadium if a conference invites SWT to affiliate.

The entire business plan assumes SWT will be invited to join a conference.

"We could go out and build a 30,000-seat stadium," Supple said. "Now, what we would do is build it cheaply. At least initially, the expanded seats would be the bleacher type."

Supple said he expects that if Bobcat football can enter Division I-A under the current rules before the window closes in 2004, then SWT would have some sort of probationary period to get into compliance with the new stricter attendance criteria.

Studer said he is not so convinced.

"I wouldn't recommend this, but theoretically, we could get a bunch of portable stands in there and try to get 17,000 in actual attendance for a season, but then we would be bounced right out of there when the new rules took effect," he said.

"It's conceivable, but I don't think that's going to happen, first of all because of our attendance," Athletic Director Greg LaFleur said expanding the stadium was the easy part.

"We could add the 15,000 seats; that's tangible," he said.

The expansion of Bobcat Stadium has often been billed as something SWT is required to do to get Division I-A football, even though that is not the case.

"The stadium must have 30,000 seats," LaFleur said. "It's required. We would have to expand the stadium."

The Winter 2000 edition of Currents, which solicits financial support from alumni and is published by SWT's office of Media Relations and Publications, stated, "Plans are underway to expand the stadium to the required 30,000 seats."

Officially, there are no plans to expand Bobcat Stadium and any statement that implies such an expansion was ever announced is not accurate, Studer said.

Deck stacked for Minutewomen

A-10 success likely in the cards at Garber

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

When it comes to field hockey action tonight, queens are definitely wild.

Massachusetts will try to invoke house rules when Atlantic 10 foe Rhode Island invades Richard F. Garber Field for a 7 p.m. contest. The Maroon and White (5-7, 2-0 A-10) went two-for-two in conference-opening action last weekend to gather speed for its stretch run, while the Rams (4-9, 1-1 A-10) blanked LaSalle 3-0 on Sunday to end a seven-game losing streak.

"We've definitely got some momentum now," said junior Erika Whiston, whose four goals place her in a tie for second in scoring on the team. "Our practice [yesterday] was awesome; everybody was upbeat and really playing togeth er."

The deck certainly appears stacked in the home team's favor against Rhody when history is brought into the equation. The Maroon and White has won 25 of the 27 meetings between the two teams. UMass has outscored the Rams by a total of 100-11 in that span, including a stag gering 20 shutouts.

"We need to keep that tradition going," goal keeper Ashley Egland said. "We need to make [this] the 21st shutout."

In the first 18 UMass/URI contests, the Rams managed two goals – total.

Whiston saw the two teams' histories as a dou ble-edged sword, in that URI could use its past failure as fuel just as easily as UMass could use its success.

"It's like when we played UConn, and we had 'HH' – for Husky haters – written on our arms," Whiston said. "That sort of thing can give you a lot of motivation."

The Minutewomen open a four-game home stand with tonight's matchup, after playing 10 of their first 12 games on foreign soil. It will also mark a return to turf for Shea's fleet-footed squad, which was forced to play last weekend's matches at La Salle and West Chester on natural grass.

"Playing on grass was kind of like a flashback to high school," said freshman Caitlin Beresin. "We did better than I thought we would, hav ing only practiced on grass twice this season."

The faster AstroTurf surface at Garber should provide additional fuel to the Maroon and White offense, while challenging a Rain squad that plays its home games on grass.

The UMass attack has come up all aces since the onset of conference play, after being trumped by opposing defensive schemes for much of the early season. Scoring over the weekend came largely from freshman Ashley Gilbert, who accounted for three of the team's four goals against the Explorers and Golden Rams.

"Ashley really came through in the clutch when we needed her to this weekend," said head coach Patty Shea. "She took advan tage of the few opportunities that we had [to score]."

Whiston credited her team's offensive awakening to increased aggression at the moment of truth – staring into the teeth of the opposing goal.

"When we're getting the ball, we're not afraid to shoot like we used to be," said the Athol native. "We're no longer looking for that perfect shot."

As the UMass offense has heated up, the defense has also risen to the challenge and lit erally iced its opponents' attacks. After allow ing 23 goals in their first seven games, the Minutewomen tightened things up and have since let up only five tallies in their last four outings.

The D got especially stingy over the past week, when Egland racked up 22 saves and only a single goal allowed in 240 minutes of play. The sophomore credits her fellow Minutewomen for much of the success that she has recently enjoyed between the pipes.

"It's not just a matter of having confi dence in myself; it's a matter of my team mates having faith in me," Egland said. "They're letting me get balls I wouldn't nor mally get to take, and that shows they believe in me."

Two Ashleys, two awards

As the Massachusetts field hockey team picked up its first two A-10 victories over the past week, the accolades have begun to come in.

Ashley Egland

This past Sunday, goalie Ashley Egland was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week and freshman forward Ashley Gilbert was named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for their performances against Providence, West Chester and La Salle.

"We had some players have outstanding performances this weekend, so it's nice to be recognized," said head coach Patty Shea.

Over the week, Egland, an Ilion, N.Y., native, played as good as she ever has, post ing a jaw-dropping 0.28 goals against aver age and a .964 save percentage.

Against Providence on Wednesday, the sophomore netkeeper kept the Friars score less for two halves and two overtime peri ods before finally succumbing in strokes, as the Minutewomen lost 1-0.

In conference play against LaSalle, Egland made a solid six saves as her team picked up the 2-1 victory, but her finest performance of the week came in shutting down West Chester, netting a career-high 15 saves while simultaneous ly keeping the oppo sition scoreless.

Ashley Gilbert

"Ashley had one of the best games of her career," Shea said of Egland's effort against the Golden Rams. "She took care of everything they threw at her on our end of the field."

Gilbert, on the other hand, was the offen sive star of the week, posting game-winning goals in both of UMass' conference games. Against West Chester, the Turner, Maine native drilled home both Maroon and White scores, for her first ever multiple-goal game.

With the three scores, Gilbert moved up to a tie for second on the Minutewomen with four goals. This was the second Rookie of the Week nod that the 5-foot-10 scoring machine has garnered this season.

"I just keep raising the bar for myself," Gilbert said. "I try to perfect my game every time out there."

Seeing red in the Cage

V-ball doesn't bounce back

With its third consecutive loss, the Massachusetts volleyball team is seeing red. Yesterday, it was a Crimson shade of red.

The Minutewomen fell to non-con ference foe Harvard 3-1 last night at Curry Hicks Cage, marking their first three-game losing streak on the season.

Harvard	3
UMass	1

UMass had more kills, blocks, and digs than the visiting Crimson, but was put away by a Harvard team that capital ized on its opportunities when it mat tered. And much like its last match against Duquesne, the Maroon and White stumbled out of the gates and was not able to overcome its halftime deficit.

"They don't think that they can pre pare any more [for matches]," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We've just got to find a way to get more focused in the first game."

UMass was also without outside hit ter Lymarie Llovet, one of the team's leaders in kills, as well as its top player in digs. The senior is expected to miss the next few matches due to a severe ankle sprain suffered at Duquesne on Friday.

"I think we look to Lymarie to be the heart and soul of this team; she is our rock," Kenny said. "But Janeen [DeMarte] did a good job tonight of being a leader and trying to keep us on track."

The two squads exchanged the first 12 points in game one before Harvard went on several mini-runs to take a 16-9 advantage. The Minutewomen cut it to 19-15 after a Jitka Stehnova kill, but Harvard eventually took control with a five-point run, capped off by a kill from star freshman Kaoge Ogbeche, to take a 28-18 lead. The Crimson eventually fin ished off the Maroon and White 30-22, as they committed only four errors in the opener and hit for an exceptional .364 percentage.

The Harvard attack was just as deadly in game two, as they fell victim to only three hitting miscues for a .333 hitting percentage. The visitors were staked to a 17-12 lead, but the Minutewomen charged back, highlighted by two kills from senior Lauren Vander Veen, to cut the deficit to 17-16.

However, the Crimson put the home team away, taking eight of the next nine points to take a commanding 25-17 lead. UMass closed to within five points after freshman Carol Mattos slammed home one of her 11 kills, but Harvard again took control and won game two, 30-22, to head into the locker room with a 2-0 lead.

But after the halftime festivities, the Minutewomen looked like a completely different team. Their offense clicked on all cylinders, barnstorming to a 5-0 lead, led by kills from Mattos, Vander Veen, and Nitia Small. The Minutewomen held a consistent advantage of four or five points throughout the game, and eventu ally ran away with the third frame, 30-

Deren, Minutemen drop Saints

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

It is really hard being a fresh man on the Massachusetts men's soccer team. The majority of the talent of this year's squad lies in the hands of the upperclass men.

UMass	3
Siena	2

Seniors like Fred Kinateder and J.R. Pouncey are permanent mem bers of the starting backfield and juniors Jeff Deren and Yuri Morales always get the nod from Head Coach Sam Koch to manhan dle the offensive attack. UMass has been winning mainly because of the experience and leadership of their upperclassmen.

Yesterday at Totman Field, a freshman named Martin Burrell got his chance to shine and show the UMass faithful that you do not need to be aged to help your team succeed.

In a match that was supposed to be played on Sept. 14 but was postponed due to the Sept. 11 attacks, the Minutemen dueled with an out-of-conference oppo nent, the Siena Saints, yesterday in Amherst and came out victorious, 3-2. The victory was UMass' fifth in a row and eighth in its last nine games. The Minutemen's overall record is now 9-3.

"We are slowly but surely get ting better and better as a team," Koch said. "Each game we are playing a little bit better and improving on what we need to improve on."

Coach Koch opened the match with his starters against the lowly 4-7 Saints, but in the 28th minute, he sent in a new troop of players to relieve his tired and worn out starting group.

"We got a lot of playing time for the guys who normally don't see it," Koch said. "Our starting group needed some rest."

A bright up-and-coming star, Burrell highlighted the bench play.

In the 34th minute, with the match tied at one, the midfielder from Virginia Beach, Virg. gained control of the ball in front of the Siena net after a scramble and put it through the extended arms of Saint goalkeeper Jonathon Hicks. The goal gave UMass a 2-1 lead going into halftime. From that point on, UMass was in the lead for the rest of the match.

All of Burrell's teammates jumped on top of him following the goal – celebrating the fact that it was the first goal of his brief col legiate career.

"It feels really great," said Burrell. "I just have been waiting for it for a long time and now that it has come, it feels really good."

Threatened SGA meets with Admin

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Senate met last night, almost a week after a judiciary case was filed which threatens their existence.

Associate Vice Chancellor and Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin was present at last night's meeting in an effort to enlighten the Senate of her role within the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Vanin spoke to the Senate about the Dean of Student's Offices and their goals of responding to students' needs and concerns within the University.

"What our main concern is about the quality of student life outside the class room," Vanin said. "We're here to deal with negative bureaucracy and try to help and work with students to resolve any issues in which they may have."

Vanin continued by explaining the other areas of service that the Dean of Students office holds, one being short-term, interest-free student loans.

"Something a lot of students don't know is that we give interest-free loans out to students," Vanin said. "Sometimes they're for medical assis tance, sometimes for a students car that's been towed and we're trying to help them out, but it only is effective if students pay their loans, and for the most part we've been successful with this."

Vanin concluded, saying that her job deals with judicial issues surrounding students and the University. Many in the SGA have made the Dean of Students judicial system an issue. She explained her responsibility was to oversee due process in protecting students' rights on campus.

"We work with the SGA and the Judiciary Advisors and make student council available for students if they have a case to plea and are in need of consultation or advice," Vanin said.

The Senate meeting continued as members of the Executive Cabinet spoke to the Senate regarding issues surround ing the University's budget and what to expect in the near future in light of Sept. 11. Student Trustee Jon Laubinger spoke about the possibility of effects within the University budget and possi bly that of the SGA.

Speaker Aaron Saunders spoke on the University budget in response to a motion passed by the Senate on Oct. 10, urging the administration to look at funding imbalances between athletics and academics. The motion was matched a motion passed by the Faculty Senate two weeks ago, but also called for funding to be cut from areas other than Student Affairs.

"I've asked them to strongly consider our motion as well as for the administra tion to give the SGA feedback and their reactions to what we've presented," Saunders said.

Saunders continued speak to the Senate regarding the pending judiciary case that was filed against him and the Elections Commission.

The case submitted was a photocopy of the same case submitted against last year's Election Commission and former Senate Speaker Jim Ehrmgham. Former Senate members Steve Morin and Steve Castillo petitioned the case on the grounds of the violation of Title 8 Chapter 4 of the SGA Constitution.

"With all the issues that we as a Senate have to deal with this year, it is just sad that there are individuals who have nothing better to do than try to hin der our progress only for their own per sonal retribution," Saunders said.

Saunders further explained that the case filed failed to state how voters and candidates were affected, and that is a fiction.

Red Cross bombed by accident

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Pentagon acknowledged the destruction of one or more warehouses controlled by the International Committee of the Red Cross outside of Kabul, Afghanistan on Tuesday.

"Bombs from a U.S. Navy F/A-18 Hornet inadvertently struck one or more warehouses used by the International Committee of the Red Cross in northern Kabul, Afghanistan," the Defense Department said in a released statement. "Reports from the ICRC indicate that wheat and other humanitarian supplies stored in the warehouses were destroyed, and an Afghan security guard was injured."

The ICRC has confirmed that one employee was injured, but was transported to a local hospital and is in stable condi tion.

The ICRC says that the warehouses, located two kilometers away from Kabul's airport, are well marked with red crosses.

"Like all other ICRC facilities in the country, it is clearly distinguishable from the air by the large red cross painted against a white background on the roof of each building," the ICRC said in a released statement. "One of the five buildings in the compound suffered a direct hit. It contained blankets, tar paulins and plastic sheeting and is reported to be completely destroyed. A second building, containing food supplies, caught fire and was partially destroyed before the fire was brought under control."

The U.S. government claim that they "did not know" the Red Cross utilized the buildings.

The University of Massachusetts Foreign Language Resource Center's plans to give its reception space a whole new look has extend ed its call to student artists an addi tional week, project proposals will be accepted until Friday, Oct. 26, 2001.

"Aesthetically, the center has not changed in over a decade. New art work would be refreshing for both staff and students," stated Brian Belval, a graduate assistant at the FLRC.

FLRC Director Irene Starr explained that the front area is busy with doors, dropped ceilings, and columns and had been thinking of an art project for some time. "My hope is that a project could be an interesting focus," Starr said. The FLRC submitted a proposal to the UMass Arts Council, who agreed to finance the project.

"The goal of the project is to cel ebrate and encourage the study of language and world culture. The selected artwork will symbolize the FLRC's commitment to these stud ies, in addition to celebrating the artistic spirit of the community," the FLRC outlined in its proposal to the Arts Council.

Applicants should submit a one-page proposal as well as a sample of past work. Artwork of any

Wide awake in the City that never sleeps

On location at America's largest crime scene

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK CITY – The City that Never Sleeps is still very much trapped in its most horrible nightmare.

It has been over a month since the solace of Manhattan life was engulfed in clouds of burning jet fuel and buried in an avalanche of crumbling concrete. The bodies of countless vic tims have been pulled from the wreckage, allowing a wound ed nation to slowly shift focus from devastation to retaliation, from fear to anger and retribution.

But even now, smoke is still rising from the rubble at New York's Ground Zero. A city struggling to move on has been caught up in a second wave of fear, this time from a potential ly deadly disease attacking through the U.S. Mail. And even with the Big Apple more on-edge than ever, its streets are ripe with opportunists milking every dollar possible from the rise of New York's patriotic pulse.

Broadway and Liberty Street

A block away from literal Ground Zero is as close as any one can get without special credentials. Police have sealed off the area with concrete barricades and chain-link fence, a move made necessary by the thousands of tourists that now flock to the southern tip of Manhattan Island on a daily basis. Hundreds of filmmakers and photographers capture images of the scene, though the view from the corner is of nothing more than a smoking gray pile dotted with the yellow hardhats of relief workers.

But by looking up, one gets a much clearer view of the Sept. 11 aftermath.

The most sobering image to those familiar with the area isn't an image at all; it's the lack of an image, the empty space where the World Trade Center's Twin Towers once stood. The massive patch of empty sky there now is broken only by the necks of the cranes and hoists poised above the wreckage of Ground Zero.

In truth, the sky isn't truly empty; there is the smoke. Fires within the wreckage have smoldered since the attacks, creat ing columns of dank-smelling mist that have systematically carried throughout the city on the shifting winds. More than anything else, the smell of Ground Zero simply will not allow the Big Apple's residents to forget.

"For the first couple of days there was no smell, because the smoke was blowing out to sea," said Jason Bliss, a University of Massachusetts graduate who has lived in Manhattan for five years. "Then one day the wind changed and there was this awful, burnt-rubber stench that just hung over everything."

The aftereffects of Sept. 11's horror were seen throughout the city's five boroughs, with residents of Brooklyn and even Long Island reporting ash accumulating on their parked cars and smoke drifting in through their air conditioning systems. The smell has subsided somewhat in the month-plus since the incidents, but on certain days it returns with a vengeance to remind those within the city of the devastation downtown.

"When the air pressure is low, you can still smell the smoke," Bliss said. "You think it's finally gone away, but it just keeps coming back."

The stretch of Broadway that used to lie within the shadow of the Twin Towers is known as "the Canyon of Heroes," in reference to the numerous ticker-tape parades that have origi nated there, but without the towers looming overhead it is hard to apply the canyon metaphor.

The hero aspect, however, is inescapable. Even the cold gray metal of the chain link fences around ground zero is alive, plastered with words and pictures celebrating those involved in the city's recovery effort. The entire facade of a Fleet Bank at the corner of Broadway and Liberty has become a bulletin board of pride and hope, where visitors to a nation's wound can post their own messages of healing.

"FDNY & NYPD - OUR HEROES," boasts one message scrawl. "HOPE WILL CONQUER HATE" reads another. A child of no more than five years, his graphic wedged firmly in the corner of his canvas in concentration, is held up by his father as he writes his Sharpie across the facade. The image is chaotic at first appears to be nothing more than an incoherent scribble, closer inspection reveals a series of crooked horizontal lines rising from the base.

It is a house of life.

West 52nd Street and 11th Ave

Those who work in Manhattan have described the task of returning to work after Sept. 11 as "virtually impossible." Even after coming to grips with their own fear as human beings, shopkeepers and employees had to then contend with a crippled economy in a city that potential visitors were now giving serious second thoughts to visit.

But NYC is renowned for its grittiness, for the resilient resiliency of its residents who journey from all over the globe to tough it out on the country's meanest streets. A mere two days after the horror of the attacks, New Yorkers limped back into their respective workplaces and tried to put the terror behind them.

It wasn't easy.

"On Thursday the 15th, I got on the train and made my way back into the city," said Michelle Beckles, a Brooklyn resident. "When we crossed over into Manhattan and stopped near Wall Street, the whole train filled up with the awful smell and I just starting crying. I had watched the whole thing on TV, and that just made it really hit home."

If the wounds from Sept. 11 had begun to heal over in the weeks since, they were ripped back open by the recent wave of bio-chemical attacks that have targeted media outlets and government offices within the city. The Associated Press reported yesterday that anthrax spores were discovered in the Manhattan headquarters of Governor George Pataki, causing officials to shut the offices down through the weekend and initiate a precautionary administration of ciprofloxacin, the drug therapy used to combat the bacteria.

Prior attacks had targeted media outlets; the seven-month old child of an ABC News producer contracted the disease and an envelope sent to Tom Brokaw at NBC-TV tested positive for anthrax spores.

Beckles happens to work in one of NYC's many media outlets, albeit one that seems pretty far removed from such activity. Her daily commute brings her to the corner of West 52nd St. and 11th Ave., where she works in production for the Food Network (FN). Though it seems unlikely for headline-hungry terrorists to attack a cable network that centers on cooking, employees there aren't taking any chances. With a security guard already posted at its front entrance, the FN has now gone as far as to offer rubber gloves to its employees for use in opening mail.

> "The only time I really get scared is on the trains," Beckles said. "There are so many delays now that you sometimes get stuck for 30 or 40 minutes at a time, sitting in the dark tunnels between stations. That's when I start thinking about hijacking and all the things that could go wrong, and I get scared."

Some have argued that such measures heighten security at the expense of creating additional fear, but Beckles isn't worried about her office being bombed or her mail being booby-trapped with deadly bacteria. Hers are much simpler fears, grounded in fundamental elements like darkness, uncertainty and helplessness.

"The only time I really get scared is on the trains," Beckles said. "There are so many delays now that you sometimes get stuck for 30 or 40 minutes at a time, sitting in the dark tunnels between stations. That's when I start thinking about hijacking and all the things that could go wrong, and I get scared."

Columbus Circle Station

"Dollar, dollar, dollar, dollar, dollar..."

The woman on the subway station steps is old, probably 70 or so. Her rail-thin arms are outstretched, her bony fingers clutching the edges of a sizeable piece of cardboard. Through this crude display are stuck probably close to 100 tiny buttons, no bigger around than a dime. From a distance it is impossible to discern the image that adorns them.

(Much) closer inspection reveals it to be an American flag, or at least an artist's crude representation of one. Instead of 13 horizontal stripes, it has eight. The background behind the stars, which are nothing more than a handful of microscopic white dots, is purple.

The woman is asked why the flags are red, white and purple. Her eyes widen in confusion, as if she doesn't understand the question at all. But she pauses only a more an instant before resuming her mantra.

"Dollar, dollar, dollar, dollar, dollar..."

As odd as this scene is, it is far from unusual in today's New York City. In a place where dozens of umbrella salesmen spring up at the first sign of raindrops, the chance to make some quick cash off of a rekindled American spirit has not been squandered. Just about every other block on Manhattan Island offers some new symbol of patriotism for sale, be it flags or bandanas or air brushed paintings of the Twin Towers with "9-11... we won't forget" in delicate script across the top. Some of the sidewalk charcoal artists have even taken – believe it or not – to selling portraits of Osama bin Laden.

But most have opted to peddle patriotism. Many of them stand behind their wares with nationalistic rhetoric, offering customers an earful of idealism to go along with their red, white and blue keepsakes.

Is any of that pride genuine, or is it really about the "dollar, dollar, dollar?"

"On one hand it's nice to see so much patriotism, but come on," Bliss said. "This is a capitalist society, and people will try to work any angle they can to make a buck."

A walk along Central Park South lends serious credibility to Bliss' theory; no less than a dozen flag peddlers have set up shop among the hot dog carts and horse drawn carriages that line the park's border. A few have resorted to somewhat aggressive marketing strategies, actually placing flags into people's hands and then requesting money from them.

Such a tactic brings to mind the classic "windshield washing" scheme for which the city is famous; Bliss goes as far as to speculate that the two groups of hawkers are one and the same.

"They put away their squeegees and started selling flags," Bliss said.

appropriate medium will be considered – painting on canvas, mosaic, mixed media, etc. The FLRC is soliciting students interested in art, interior design, architecture and "any creative-minded student."

Because of the nature of the FLRC, Belval stated that the FLRC's hope is "to hear from a diverse group of students." He added, "content considering foreign languages and culture will be considered before material that does not."

The FLRC is prepared is accept one or two submissions, depending on the size of the projects, costs of the materials, etc. Art materials and costs will be provided by the FLRC and the artist will receive an honorarium upon completion of the project.

Winning proposals will be selected by FLRC staff, namely Starr and Belval, and will be announced shortly after the Oct. 26 deadline. There is no set date for the completion of the artwork and the FLRC is willing to arrange the project deadline for mutual convenience.

The FLRC highly encourages all interested applicants to visit the FLRC in 19 Herter Hall to survey the space and to speak with the staff. Belval and Starr can be reached at 545-0950 and additional information can be found at www.umass.edu/langctr/contest.

difference between this year's and last year's case.

"There is a big difference between last year and this year, in that no candidates or voters were affected by the outcome of this years elections," Saunders said.

Chancellor of Elections Sam Balasiak came before the Senate stating that if anyone is looking for someone to blame; blame him.

"Despite popular opinion, I'm responsible for this year's elections, not Aaron Saunders, John Sheehan or anyone on the Executive Cabinet," Balasiak said. "And to blame the SGA leadership is wrong."

Aside from announcements regarding the judiciary case, the Senate approved nine students to the Campus Center Student Union Commission (CCSUC).

The commission controls all vendors in the Campus Center, works with Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) and helps in the allocation of space within the CCSU complex for student use.

The Senate also approved R. Keith Kelley and Nicholas Bergeron to serve as Justices on the Student Judiciary.

The Senate did not have any main motions on last night's agenda, and Saunders attributed the lack of motions as a result of Senators working to put together quality motions.

"We haven't had the time to fully research good ideas for motions, last year we would have had 16 motions that would have been garbage and a waste of our time," Saunders said. "Everyone is working to put together quality motions which in turn will help improve the SGA's reputation with students and the administration."

targeted by U.S. forces because the Taliban used them for storage of military equipment," the Pentagon said in a released statement. "Military vehicles had been seen in the vicinity of these warehouses. U.S. forces did not know that ICRC was using one or more of the warehouses."

The Pentagon says it is still investigating the incident.

The announcement comes on the heels of Saturday's report that a U.S. Navy strike plane missed its target and dropped a 2000-pound smart bomb on a residential area outside of Kabul on Friday, Oct. 12.

"A U.S. Navy F/A-18 Hornet missed its intended target and inadvertently dropped a 2000-pound GPS-guided Joint Direct Attack Munition (JDAM) in a residential area near Kabul Airport, Afghanistan," the Pentagon said in a released statement. "The intended target was a military helicopter at Kabul Airport, approximately one mile from the residential area."

The JDAM is actually a kit, produced by the Boeing Company, which converts conventional bombs into guided weapons. The 2000-pound weapon dropped on the residential area is the largest JDAM that Boeing makes.

The Pentagon is still trying to determine the extent of the damage, and the cause of the accident.

"We have no accurate way of estimating the number of casualties, but reports from the ground indicate there may have been four deaths and eight injured," the Defense Department said in a released statement. "Although details are being investigated and may take several days, preliminary indications are that the accident occurred from a targeting process error."

At Monday's Pentagon briefing, Air Force General Richard B. Meyers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, called the incident "unfortunate."

"We had an unfortunate case where we missed the target near the Kabul airfield," Meyers told reporters. "Our planners, in fact, do everything they can to avoid such mishaps, but sometimes these things, unfortunately, happen. Operations continue."

The Department of Defense "regret any innocent casualties."

"We care a great deal about civilian casualties. We have to. Think of the thousands of innocent Americans that were killed by the terrorists," Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said in an interview with Al Jezeera, a Qatar based news-television station, on Tuesday. "What we have done is to exercise great care. But the reality is when there's that much ammunition and ordnance and munitions flying around in a country, there will inevitably be some unintended casualties."

ATTENTION STUDENTS:

Monday, October 29 is the LAST day for undergraduates and continuing education students to drop a course with a "W."

Doing so will have no adverse impace on your cumulative average. A "W" on one's transcript is almost always preferable to an "F."

Consult your academic dean for advice and appropriate procedures to follow. In making your decision, be aware that you need to carry 12 credits for financial aid/health insurance purposes.

Sit and listen:
Let the musicians play

One of the first things to drop from our conscious after the attacks of September 11th was entertainment – all forms of film, music and other media suddenly vanished, however briefly, from the national radar. What had just hours before been priority and page-one news was quickly cast away by the horrid events of one Tuesday morning.

The popular opinion was – and rightly so – that our efforts be collectively pushed into regaining our lives and sense of security. What else mattered? What else even registered? Nothing. Not on the 11th, and not for many of the days that followed.

We've had more than a month now to try and step away as best we can, to return to the simple, everyday pleasures that are ultimately meaningless but offer diversions from our daily lives. The entertainment world has taken similar steps, and is entirely appropriate in doing so.

Rather than displaying their enormous wealth, artists have put on display their enormous hearts, using their fame to benefit those hurt in the attacks.

Bono, lead singer of U2, brought a diverse group of artists together to record a version of the Marvin Gaye classic "What's Going On." The song, originally recorded to reflect the AIDS climate in Africa, took on a new significance in the wake of the World Trade Center, Pentagon and Pennsylvania tragedies. The Beastie Boys will headline a benefit show on October 28th at the Hammerstein Ballroom. Dubbed "New Yorkers Against Violence," the show will also include artists the Strokes, Cibo Matto and poet Saul Williams. Bono, once again, will be joined by U2 guitarist The Edge, David Bowie, Elton John, the Who, Paul McCartney and others at "The Concert for New York" at Madison Square Garden to raise monies for NYC victims and families.

The benefits – and there are more planned – are being tossed aside by some as superficial efforts on the part of millionaires grossly out of touch with what's happening; they are seen as publicity stunts designed to draw attention to the artists themselves. As empty acts that, in the end, won't change a thing.

What's fair in that, though? Why attack the artists when there are bigger things to zero in on? They're doing all they can, which, as musicians and artists, is getting their product out for the public to pay attention to. It won't change the world, but few things will. Like those students rallying outside the Student Union, attending teach-ins, writing editorials and discussing the events among friends, the word is getting sent out to an audience willing to listen.

Most of these artists don't belong any deeper then they are: let them play their music, organize their concerts, and let us try something we haven't had a chance to do in awhile: sit back and enjoy.

Quitting not an easy change

ROB SCHULZE

I quit my job. Just like that. Some things didn't go the way I would have liked. I felt that I couldn't accomplish what I needed to, and my love for it just flushed away. So I quit.

Envious? People think that quitting your job for reasons of personal fulfillment is some sort of fairy tale that ends with Kevin Spacey taking off a cheerleader's shirt and then getting shot in the head. You get to work at McDonalds, buy a new car and just kind of chill and smoke weed. It's supposedly paradise.

As for my part, though, I'd have to say that the reality of the situation is far, far less glamorous than those bastards in Hollywood would have you believe. There is an exhilaration to it, and a sense of pride, but there's also horrible nervousness and a sense of having just been ejected from a space shuttle, where you don't know which way is up and which way is down, or even if it matters, knowing that where you land depends on factors almost entirely out of your control.

My rent is still due at the end of the month. I still owe my roommate over 200 clams for bills. I still need to eat. It would have been so easy to just stick around, go through the motions, collect a paycheck. No one would have had the heart to fire me, I don't think, no matter how useless I got. Easy Street, man.

Couldn't do it, though. Not even a little.

I got this far in my life and achieved what little success I can claim by sticking with my guns and not being swerved from by beliefs and my morals for any means. I can't change that now. I can't change that later. No matter how many jobs I have to quit and how many times I have to cast myself into the freakin' ether and nothingness I have to hold on to what makes me ME.

The money isn't the worst part, though. This job has been more than employment – it's been a second home, my coworkers a surrogate family, our work a source of great pride. To a large extent I have defined my life and the way I lived it by my employment. I've sacrificed. I've been blessed. I actually, to be honest, never thought that it would end. It felt like I'd been kicked in the nuts when I realized that I had changed. I was an instant outsider in the place that I had called home, and the only person who had caused this exclusion was me. Everyone was the same, the place was the same, the work was the same, but I was different.

The consequences are too many to relate. They go beyond money, beyond a resume. They strike at almost every facet of my life. I am changed, and I won't be the same. It saddens me. The last page in an important part of my life has been written.
